Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I should like now to proceed with the bill which is before the Senate. When the bill was last under consideration we stopped at chapter 6. The next chapter for consideration is chapter 7.

Mr. THOMAS. I wish to offer an amendment to the bill, to be known as section 4 of chapter 7, which I will read:

Add a new section to chapter 7, as follows:

"SEC. 4. All boards of trade, chambers of commerce, stock exchanges, or other bodies or associations engaged in or permitting speculations in food products of any character in the form of what are known as futures, or in any other form or character, are hereby suspended until the President, by proclamation, shall declare the existing war to have been ended; and all agreements, wagers and contracts, or wagers regarding food products of the character now and heretofore made in or upon such exchanges, boards of trade, chambers of commerce, or other bodies or associations by the members thereof are hereby prohibited pending such proclamation. Any person, board of trade, chamber of commerce, stock exchange, or other body or association willfully violating the provisions of this section, or any of them, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not to exceed $10,000."

I should like to have the amendment printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SUTHERLAND in the chair). The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. WALSH. When the bill was last before the Senate section 7 of chapter 5 was under consideration.

Mr. OVERMAN. I had lost sight of that. I will go back to that after we get through with the bill. All that was passed over, and I will call it up again. Did the Senator from Colorado ask to have his amendment printed?

Mr. THOMAS. I desire to have the amendment printed and lie on the table.

Mr. OVERMAN. This chapter might be passed this evening, and if the Senator desires his amendment printed he had better offer it to some other section of the bill.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not think the Senator from North Carolina will get through with this chapter this afternoon.

Mr. OVERMAN. Perhaps not.

Mr. THOMAS. I will say, however, that if we can get a vote upon it, I shall certainly not allow the amendment which I have offered to prevent it. I shall then offer the amendment to another part of the bill, although I think it should be appropriately considered in connection with chapter 7.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, on page 24, after line 15, to insert:

CHAPTER VII.

CERTAIN EXPORTS IN TIME OF WAR UNLAWFUL.

SECTION 1. Whenever the United States is at war and the President shall find that the public safety or welfare shall so require, and shall make proclamation thereof, it shall be unlawful to export any article or articles from the United States, except at such time or times, and from such place or places, and under such regulations and orders, and subject to such limitations and exceptions as the President shall prescribe, until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to offer a substitute for that section, which really is an amendment to it; but I have had it printed as the section will read as proposed to be amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to substitute for section 1, chapter 7, the following:

SECTION 1. When during the pending war the President shall find that exports to a particular country are being used to supply an enemy country, and shall make proclamation thereof, it shall be unlawful to export any article or articles from the United States to such country except and under such regulations and orders and subject to such limitations and exceptions as the President shall prescribe, until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, as originally drawn, this section has two objections. First, it is unconstitutional. I think that may still be suggested on the floor of the Senate as an objection to legislation, whether it carries much weight or not. It authorizes the limitation of exports from the ports of one State against imports of another; it allows the selection of ports from which exports are to go. It can hardly be questioned that the Constitution forbids any discrimination against the ports of States.

Mr. OVERMAN. Would the Senator call a shipment from one State to another an export?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; from any port of this country to a port abroad.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is an export. The Senator said from one port in this country to another.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; the Senator from North Carolina misunderstood me, or else I expressed myself very badly. I said it permits discrimination between the ports from which exports are to go abroad. Under its terms the President can designate the ports of the State of South Carolina, from which alone cotton could be shipped or the ports of Georgia, from which alone naval stores could be shipped, or the ports of any other State.

Mr. JONES of Washington. As I heard the Senator's amendment read from the desk, I gathered from it that it left that power in the hands of the President—not in express terms, but that under such rules and regulations as he might direct exports can be made.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not under my amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I did not notice any language in the Senator's amendment which limited the President in that respect.

Mr. GALLINGER. And, Mr. President, under the terms of the bill, I will ask the Senator if exports might not be permitted from the port of Boston and not from the port of New York or Baltimore or Philadelphia?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; and I think that is unconstitutional.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Constitution means anything, that provision is unconstitutional. I stand for the old Constitution; but it has been very badly fractured in the last couple of years.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I was suggesting that we might pay some respect to it at the present time.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think we ought to do so.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The language of the section as it reads expressly provides that—

> It shall be unlawful to export any article or articles from the United States, except at such time or times, and from such place or places, and under such regulations and orders, and subject to such limitations and exceptions as the President shall prescribe, until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress.

It expressly, I think, would confer the authority upon the President to designate a particular place or a particular State alone from which exports could be made.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think it is very important that when the Senator makes that statement he should also state that that is only to be done whenever "the public safety or welfare" of the country makes it necessary.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes. I do not think we could authorize the President to select the ports of any single State and allow exports from them alone against the ports of another State. I think the Constitution prohibits the deposit of such authority with the President.

Mr. GALLINGER. In other words, Mr. President, we could not well authorize by legislation the President of the United States to suspend the Constitution of the country.

Mr. OVERMAN. What section of the Constitution does the Senator speak of?

Mr. GALLINGER. I can not turn to it immediately, but it is definitely stated in the Constitution—and my memory is very good as to that—that we can not differentiate between the ports of the United States.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That "no preference shall be given * * * to the ports of one State over those of another."

Mr. OVERMAN. That no preference shall be given to any ports as to exports.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The constitutional provision is:

> No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is right—from one State to another.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia and Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, no.

Mr. THOMAS. Preference shall not be given to one over another.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That no preference shall be given to the ports of one State over those of another.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Now, Mr. President, the amendment which I offer also eliminates what I consider another objectionable provision in this section. I do not believe we have reached the place where we should be ready to transfer our entire export business to the control of any officer of the United States. I would be utterly unwilling to permit the President or anybody else to determine just what can be exported from the United States. To reach such a view, of necessity, I think, requires almost a feeling of hysteria with regard to present conditions. It seems to me that, while we have declared war and while we are preparing to do our full part in it, we should interfere with the general business of the country and with normal conditions just as little as possible. I believe it is best for the whole country that our interference should be as little as possible.

Now, when our commodities are going to the enemy, when shipments are going to a neutral country, but the President finds, as a matter of fact, that while they are going to Denmark they are being really shipped through Denmark to Germany, I think we may well stop that. As much as I was in favor of preserving that trade when we were at peace with Germany, now that we are at war with Germany, I am equally in favor of conducting the fight in every way we can to help bring it to a speedy close. I am thoroughly in accord with the view that if our goods needed in Germany are going to Denmark or to any neutral port and from there are being carried to Germany to aid the Germans in sustaining the war, then we, on the President finding those facts, should provide by legislation that the shipments must stop, unless under regulations prescribed by the President they can go on without, in his judgment, helping the enemy.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Suppose Congress is not in session when that emergency arises?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The amendment presented provides that regulations shall be prescribed by the President by which alone shipments can be made.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, does the Senator from Georgia think that the President of the United States in this great emergency should not have the power to interdict the exportation of those commodities absolutely essential for the welfare of the American people?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am utterly opposed to giving him that power now. I am unwilling for him, or anyone else, to pass upon that question. I am not ready myself to interdict any shipments at the present time.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think, if he will pardon me a moment, particularly in view of the fact that we may adjourn before the summer is over, that there ought to be power vested somewhere, or that we ought to give the power to some person to prevent the shipment abroad of those commodities that would be absolutely essential to the welfare of our own people?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator know that a similar power has been given heretofore upon numerous occasions to the Chief Executive of the United States?

Mr. KELLOGG. May I inquire when that power was given?

Mr. KING. It was given in the days of Adams, in the days of Jefferson, in the days of Lincoln in effect, and in the days of William McKinley.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I do not recall it having been done. I believe, however, there was such a bill during the administration of Mr. Adams, but I do not think that it was done at any other time, and my recollection is that in that instance the law was speedily repealed and very much censured.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, let me inquire of the Senator—because I should like to get his idea on the subject—is not that just exactly what the embargo act passed in Jefferson's administration was?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not recall the exact effect of that act.

Mr. WALSH. The embargo act prohibited any vessels sailing out of American ports.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. As I was about to proceed to say before the Senator from Montana interrupted me, regardless of its ever having been done in the past, I think there is no occasion for it now.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I was not discussing the question of the wisdom or the policy of it, but I was directing the attention of the Senator to the question as to the power of Congress to authorize the President to prohibit exports from this country.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I was not questioning the power of Congress to prohibit exports.

Mr. WALSH. No; but to authorize the President by a proclamation to do so.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I was not questioning the power of Congress to authorize the President by proclamation to prohibit exports. I questioned the authority of Congress to authorize the President to permit exports from one State and to exclude them from other States. I questioned that.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, would the President of the United States do that?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not know what he would do; but I am opposed to voting for an act that would authorize him to do an illegal thing.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does not the Senator think that we have got to trust the President in this day and time to do things that are right and honorable and just?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; but I believe in preserving some respect also for ourselves by not putting into a bill an authority to the President that would be unconstitutional if he exercised it.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I think the difference between this proposition and the embargo act, to which reference has been made by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], is that this relates to some particular port, while that related to all ports; it closed every port in the United States.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I am not unmindful of the distinction; but that goes simply to the question of that provision of the bill which authorizes the President to prohibit exports except from such places as he may designate. I was addressing myself simply to the question asked by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] of the Senator from Georgia, as to whether he questioned the right of Congress to place in the hands of the President the power by proclamation to prohibit exports from the country at all.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I was misunderstood if it was supposed that I questioned the right of Congress to pass a bill authorizing the President, upon the finding of certain facts, to stop even all vessels from leaving our ports, or to stop, upon the finding of certain facts as provided for in the act, the export of any particular commodity from our country. I think we can do so. I agree with the view suggested by the Senator from Montana as to the law on the subject. I was disagreeing with the Senator from Utah as to the advisability of such legislation. I do not think the situation is one that would excuse it. I do not believe such a situation will arise. If it should arise, it will be of sufficient importance to invite us back here, if we are not still here, and for Congress to consider it. I prefer to take part in passing upon it myself, if it is done at all, before it is done; but I do not anticipate a situation which I think would make it excusable.

Just a word more. I want to explain a little further precisely what is intended to be accomplished by the amendment to this section which I have drawn. It leaves the rule to be:

When during the pending war the President shall find that exports to a particular country are being used to supply an enemy country, and shall make proclamation thereof, it shall be unlawful to export any article or articles from the United States to such country—

The President, having found that our exports to a particular country were being used to supply the enemy, and having so declared by proclamation, thereafter it shall be unlawful to export to that country—except and under such regulations and orders and subject to such limitations and exceptions as the President shall prescribe, until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress.

That is to say, to illustrate, the President having found that our exports of foodstuffs to Denmark were being shipped from Denmark into Germany to feed our enemies, it would be his duty to make proclamation of that fact; and thereafter foodstuffs could not be shipped to Denmark from the United States except under such limited provisions as the regulations of the President permitted until such time as the further order of the President permitted them to go more freely.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am rising simply to ask of the Senator from Georgia a question. Do I understand him to admit that any law we may pass can be made dependent as to its taking effect upon the judgment of the President as to the public welfare?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think the Supreme Court has so held with reference to embargoes that were provided under the administration of President McKinley.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not agree with that; but I am not going to argue it at this time. I do not think it has ever been held unaccompanied by any other consideration. I do not believe that Congress can say that a certain regulation which we adopt shall be effective if the President finds that it is for the public welfare. I simply wanted to be clear as to the admission made by the Senator from Georgia. I rather hoped that he would not admit that we could repose all powers of legislation in the President to be operative upon a finding upon his part that it was for the public welfare.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Stated as broadly as the Senator from Iowa states it, I do not think we could; but I do understand that it was ruled in the embargo cases under the act, passed, I think, during the administration of President McKinley, that, upon finding certain facts, he was permitted to place an embargo upon certain shipments to certain countries. There were other facts beside simply the question of the general welfare. It was limited to a peculiar class of conditions.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Georgia is now referring to the tariff?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. And to what is known as the reciprocity provision of the tariff act?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. I really think that presents a very different question; but I am not now rising to engage the Senator in discussion about it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think that was a much more definite case than the one referred to by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. THOMAS. I thought the Senator from Georgia had yielded the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am through.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, when the bill was before the Senate more than a week ago I read very carefully the first section of chapter 7. I then thought it to be in conflict with what is known as the preference clause of the Constitution. I think that the Senator from Georgia and myself then had some discussion of the subject, and we were agreed in our prima facie view. I have since, Mr. President, had occasion to examine the section more closely and also to read the somewhat meager list of authorities in the reports of the Supreme Court of the United States affecting that clause. Of course, the Senator from Georgia, upon the assumption that the conflict is apparent, has sought to avoid it by the amendment which is now under consideration; but I do not believe that if the Senator would give that careful attention which he would bestow upon it if the subject were involved in an important lawsuit in which he was engaged he would adhere to that opinion.

I am anxious—quite as anxious as any Senator upon this floor—that the espionage bill shall not, wherever we can avoid it, trench in the slightest degree upon any fundamental constitutional rights of the citizen. Some features of it do this, in my judgment, and should therefore be well considered before they are engrafted upon the laws of the country; but I do not think that is true, Mr. President, of this section or of the clause of the Constitution which it is said to challenge. That clause provides that—

No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another; nor shall vessels bound to or from one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. It seems to me that the objection which the Senator is about to make, I take it, and which the Senator from Georgia has made to section 1, could be avoided by putting such a proviso as I am about to suggest at the end of the section:

Provided, however, That no preference—

Using the language of the Constitution—

Provided, however, That no preference shall be given to the ports of one State over those of another.

That would incorporate the language of the Constitution and would be a restriction upon the power of the President. It would cure the constitutional objection which the Senator from Georgia has made, and, I take it, which the Senator from Colorado intends to make. I am obliged to the Senator for yielding to me.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator is mistaken. I do not object to that feature of the section. I said—perhaps the Senator did not hear me—only a moment ago that more mature consideration of the section convinced me that no constitutional objection could be made to it. Nor do I see any objection to incorporating in the section as reported by the committee the amendment which the Senator suggests, although I do not concede its necessity.

I read this clause of the Constitution to emphasize the fact that it really covers two subjects—one relating to preference between ports, the other relating to duties levied upon vessels bound to or from one State from or to ports of another. Now, this preference clause is not an absolute one. It is limited to specific things, which are recited in the clause itself:

No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another.

In our commercial regulations and in our revenue laws we must not offend that provision. It is not to be supposed that the fathers in framing the Constitution limited this restriction unadvisedly or without full consideration. Generally speaking, as I have said, in the references to this section in the Supreme Court reports there is a liberality of construction which I think relieves the section as reported by the committee from the objection urged against it.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. Would the Senator claim that if the President, under this statute, made a regulation that exports could be made from certain ports and not from others that would be constitutional?

Mr. THOMAS. Undoubtedly, Mr. President; undoubtedly, if, as a war measure, the President made such a regulation, I have not the slightest doubt that the Supreme Court would sustain it. But I am now considering this matter not as sustained by the general-welfare clause of the Constitution, under which Congress is empowered to enact all legislation necessary to carry the other provisions into effect, but solely in its relation to this preference clause.

It has been several times questioned whether the levying of excise taxes upon products which are the subject of export from States did not constitute duties upon such exports, and wherever the question has been brought to the attention of the Supreme Court the decision has been against that contention. Cornell against Coyne, in One hundred and ninety-second United States, is a case upon the subject. Let me say, in further answer to the query of the Senator from Minnesota, lest I forget it, that if such a regulation as he suggested were made by the President in times of peace it would offend this particular section; but as a war measure and for the national safety such a regulation, made under such a law as this, would be sustained under the more comprehensive clauses of the Constitution, because in war the President, clothed with authority of supreme command, would in an exigency demanding it otherwise be unable to protect the Nation if——

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. As apropos of the suggestion just made by the Senator from Colorado is it not true that as a war measure the President would have the right to close and abolish ports of the United States?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, we could authorize him to do it as a war measure.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not prepared to dispute the proposition just laid down by the Senator from Colorado; but if it is done as a war measure why is any authority necessary from Congress?

Mr. THOMAS. I do not know that there is.

Mr. CUMMINS. It would seem to be very clear that it is not, if it is done in the exercise of a power higher than the Constitution.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I will not undertake to answer that question positively one way or the other, but I have not any doubt that under a statute such as is here proposed the regulation as a war measure would be sustained.

In this case of Cornell against Coyne it was determined that—

The prohibition in the Constitution against taxes or duties on exports attaches to exports as such and does not relieve articles manufactured for export from the prior ordinary burdens of taxation which rest upon all property similarly situated.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. I want to suggest to the Senator from Colorado that Abraham Lincoln gave a preference to the ports of the United States north of the Chesapeake over those south of the Chesapeake when he declared an embargo on all ports of the Southern States.

Mr. THOMAS. I have no doubt that other historic instances might be cited.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, was not that entirely upon a different view? The Southern States were claiming to be out of the Union.

Mr. OVERMAN. He claimed that they were not.

Mr. THOMAS. Well, Mr. Lincoln never admitted that they were out of the Union.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; but he treated them as being practically out of the Union.

Mr. THOMAS. And I think if Mr. Lincoln had lived they never would have been treated by the United States Government as having been out of the Union. Upon the theory, of course, that the ports against which the embargo was directed were no longer a part of the Union, there would be no necessity of appealing to the Constitution for his action or challenging its authority by measuring it with the terms of that instrument.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Was not the action of Mr. Lincoln the declaration of a blockade against those ports as against a public enemy?

Mr. THOMAS. Well, I presume that is the instance referred to by the Senator. The decision from which I just quoted only incidentally refers to the question under consideration.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. As bearing upon the suggestion made by the Senator from Montana and the question just propounded by the Senator from Georgia, I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that Thomas Jefferson discriminated in favor of some ports as against others, and forbade the exportation of wheat and certain other foodstuffs from some ports upon the Chesapeake Bay, and permitted the exportation from other ports.

Mr. THOMAS. Does the Senator know whether the power or authority of the President so exercised was ever brought to the notice of the Supreme Court in any controversy in which the question was raised?

Mr. KING. I do not recall. In fact, I found no case where the act was construed.

In the case of the Armour Packing Co. and other packing companies against United States, known as the Packers' case, in Two hundred and nine United States, beginning on page 56, it is decided that—I read from the syllabus—

The export and preference clause of the Constitution prohibits burdens only by way of actual taxation and duty—or legislation intending to give, and actually giving, the prohibited preference, and does not prohibit the merely incidental effect of regulations of interstate commerce wholly within the power of Congress; and the fact that such regulations in the interstate-commerce act may affect the ports of one State having natural advantages more than those of another State not possessing such advantages does not render the act unconstitutional as violating that provision.

Only by way of actual taxation and duty—

The court considers the proposition at greater length, commencing on page 79. I shall not take up the time of the Senate in reading more of the decision into the RECORD; but it will be noticed that the court determines that the Constitution prohibits burdens under this export and preference clause—and it is both—only by way of actual taxation and duty or legislation intending to give, and actually giving, the prohibited preference.

Now, this proposed law does neither. It does not impose a burden by way of actual taxation or duty; it does not intend to give, nor does it actually give, the prohibited preference. Consequently it is not obnoxious, even under that clause, to the Constitution of the United States, in my judgment.

Now, what does it propose to do? Simply that—whenever the United States is at war and the President shall find that the public safety or welfare shall so require, and shall make proclamation thereof, it shall be unlawful to export any article or articles from the United States, except at such time or times and from such place or places, and under such regulations and orders, and subject to such limitations and exceptions, as the President shall prescribe until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. KING. Is the Senator reading now from the original bill?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. KING. Or is he reading from the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. THOMAS. The amendment offered by the Senator is the section as it appears in the bill, altered only by the changes printed in italics. I have read from the amendment, because it is more convenient, reading only the section as it appears in the bill.

It is true, Mr. President, that the Secretary under the provisions of that section might find it necessary to prohibit the export of articles from the port of New York, and might find at the same time, and so determine, that the exigencies requiring the closure of that port for the time being did not apply to the port of Savannah or to the port of San Francisco. Will it be said that in times of war, if such an exigency presented itself, the President could not be authorized to exercise such power? The preference would doubtless appear from the proclamation; but only as an act of war, if it be true that we can enact such legislation as may be necessary to give effect to the other provisions of the Constitution, and especially to its war provisions, then, of course, it can not be contended that such a power is obnoxious to the particular provision of the Constitution.

It will probably never be necessary that an embargo be laid upon part of the ports of one of our seaboards which does not include them all. Such an authority is undoubtedly embraced within the section proposed by the committee; but what emergency, what exigency that we can foresee or even imagine, would require such a discrimination?

We can well understand how it might be desirable as a war measure to close all the Atlantic ports, leaving those on the Pacific still open and unaffected by the embargo, and vice versa; but if we have the power to do this at all, then certainly we can not afford to put any limitations upon it, since unforeseen emergencies might arise making such limitations extremely embarrassing if not destructive of the original purpose designed.

Mr. President, I am not particularly concerned about the success either of the section proposed by the committee or of the section as amended by the Senator from Georgia. I think, however, that the committee section is to be preferred under all the circumstances. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD]—and I will yield to him in a moment—the other day in an argument which did not receive the attention that it deserved demonstrated to my satisfaction that the bestowal of such authority, if it does not exist, may be very necessary to the President during this war if we are to conserve our food supply in some directions. He showed, and showed clearly, that through our exports we are losing something like 20,000,000 tin containers of canned foods and goods per month, and that in the face of a constantly decreasing supply of the material of which they are made. This, of course—Constitution or no Constitution—places an embargo in some degree upon the continued production of those food products which must be put in containers if they are to be used at all. Unless the home supply is equivalent to the demands made upon it by the export trade, and unless the President can at this time use extraordinary power to minimize this difficulty, or destroying it entirely, then we may be seriously embarrassed, not for lack of food but for lack of those materials which are necessary to its conservation; and what is true of the canned-goods industry may become equally true of other lines of food production.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, I never rise in this body without feeling that I should first apologize for taking any time. Every question is so thoroughly discussed that it seems the Senators must tire of anything anybody has to say; and yet my heart and soul is so in this section and in this bill that I am going to take a little time at this moment to discuss it in a very brief way.

I want first to pay a deserved compliment to the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]. In his remarks this afternoon on this bill there was so much solid, sound common sense, and it was so enlightening and so full of the good old Democratic doctrine that we believe in in this country. He reminded us that the same rules apply to-day which have applied during all time; that the question of supply and demand still has something to do with the prices we get for our products. Why, it is surprising to me Senators so forget themselves as to overlook the fact that within a very brief period of three years products raised in this country have touched the lowest and the highest points, and all because of the production. In my own State within three years I have seen the most magnificent crop of apples hanging on the trees rotting because there was an overproduction, and they were not worth picking. Only three years ago in the South cotton was so low they were begging for customers, and for everybody in the United States to "buy a bale of cotton"; and yet to-day I assume that cotton is about as high as it ever was known to be, and largely because of supply and demand.

I happen to belong to the wicked fraternity which the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has spoken of this afternoon as the packers, who are so robbing the people of this country that something ought to be done immediately by the Congress of the United States to throttle them, and they should be cast out of respectable society, and immediate action should be taken. I have listened to Senators who advised that all the railroads of this country should be taken over immediately by the United States; that they were robbing the people; and that something must be done to them by the Government.

I have heard that all the canning establishments of the United States should be taken over at once by the United States Government, and that food would then be produced at so low a price the humblest citizen might have plenty; and yet the largest packing houses in this country, as was spoken of by another Senator, have been doing business with a profit of one-eighth of a cent per pound on beef and mutton and pork.

It has also been suggested that the farmers should be interested and lectured to in some way to get them interested in planting larger crops, greater acreage, and more seed. But let me tell you, Mr. President, that the price of $2.50 per bushel for wheat and $14 per hundred for hogs is the greatest inducement for the farmers of the United States to raise more hogs and sow more wheat, and there will be no trouble from that direction. I believe that every acre that it is possible to plant in the United States will this season be planted, because farmers can see a profit; and the only trouble which faces us is the lack of labor.

Mr. President, I regret that I am not an attorney. I should like to discuss this question from a constitutional and legal standpoint; but I want to say that my bill, which is almost precisely the same as this section in this bill, was drawn by the Department of Justice and has the approval of that department. I also have a letter from Secretary Redfield, the Secretary of Commerce, approving the bill, and a letter from Secretary Houston, the Secretary of Agriculture, approving the bill. It has run the gantlet of the Committee on Commerce and has a favorable report from it; and it has, so far as I know, the approval of all the people in the United States who believe that the price of foodstuffs would be reduced if this course were taken.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. FERNALD. I do.

Mr. REED. If I will not interrupt the Senator, I should like to ask him a question, not in any antagonistic spirit, but to get his view.

The Senator states, I think, a very great truth when he asserts that the old law of supply and demand is still in good working force and effect; and he states another great truth which is akin to the one just referred to, and in fact is a sort of corollary of the one referred to—that $2 a bushel for wheat and $1 a bushel for corn constitute the most eloquent lectures that can be delivered to the farmers for the purpose of inducing them to plant crops. I believe that is true. I believe that if the farmer had been able to command prices of that sort for the past five or six years steadily and consistently there would have been under cultivation an immense amount of ground that has been lying idle and waste; and I believe that the certainty of such prices for the coming season would cause every farmer to exert himself to the utmost to plant and produce all that he could possibly care for and harvest.

Now, Mr. President, with that statement, which is in entire accord with what the Senator says, what will be the effect if we tell these farmers who are about ready to plant their grain, hoping for a $2 a bushel market, that at any moment the President may destroy that market and reduce that price, or that Congress at any moment may pass a maximum-price bill, so that the farmer, instead of getting the $2, may only get $1, or may get a less sum?

What will be the effect of that artificial and arbitrary—I do not mean the term in an offensive way—interference with the whole proposition?

Mr. FERNALD. I thank the Senator. I want to follow my argument a little further on the constitutionality of this law.

Section 8 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States gives the Congress power to lay and collect taxes, duties, and so forth; to borrow money on the credit of the United States; and to regulate commerce with foreign nations. Mr. President, we have not only appropriated $7,000,000,000 to carry on this war but we have given the President of the United States authority to loan that money to our friends. We have authorized the President of the United States to raise an army of 500,000 boys from 21 to 27 years old—or are about to give him that authority. We have given the President authority to send to every home in this land a military officer and take those boys from bed in the nighttime, if necessary, and if the boy says he would like to talk the matter over with his father that officer has a right to say, "No; you go with me now"; and if he should wish to have a few words with his mother he can not even do so. The officer has a right to take that boy and march him down to the post and put a gun in his hands and send him across the water and say, "You go out there and shoot to kill, and if you do not kill or if you do not shoot to kill we will kill you."

Now, we have given that authority to the President of the United States. I voted for it, and I believe it is right. Yet after that boy is shipped to France with 500,000 other boys, I assume we have got to send food over there to feed that army. Do Senators tell me that if we should ship the grain from the great West via the Grand Trunk road to Portland, Me., the natural outlet and the natural port to be shipped from, when that grain got there, and there should have been sown in the harbor of Portland hundreds of wicked mines, and that the harbor was filled with U boats, the President of the United States would not have, or ought not to have, the authority to turn the cereals to Boston or New York or some other port? Does anybody contend that ought not to be the duty of the President of the United States? Whether or not it is constitutional, it would be his duty.

A few years ago, in 1898, when we were having a war with Spain, it became necessary for the State of Maine to raise $40,000 in a very brief time, and although the governor of the State had no authority, he paid that from his own bank account rather than call together the legislature, and as soon as the legislature met, of course, it passed a resolution to reimburse him.

It seems to me that it should be one of the first duties of the President of the United States to furnish food, and yet we have not done a single thing in this Congress until yesterday toward really helping the farmer. We did pass a bill to buy some nitrates of soda. We have recommended that the people in the cities should plant little areas, and it will amount about to the experience of the friend of the Senator from Utah, who paid 5 cents for 8 peas. That is about the way the Government would come out in undertaking to run the packing establishments of this country.

Before we plant a single seed we have hundreds of bushels shipped in and every bag tested to know just what per cent of that seed is good. If it was left to the Government would they understand how to carry on that business or any other of the many details of the packing business?

Every one in this country realizes, I suppose, at this time—it has been repeated over and over again in the Senate and every paper in the United States has been saying it from time to time—that a world-wide famine is threatened by the war; that food is the first demand of the allies. Yesterday we had a most impressive ceremony in the Senate, and those gentlemen were sent over here almost purposely to see what could be done toward supplying food for the allies. That is the one main thing. We have undertaken to take over the German ships in our ports; we have undertaken to do almost everything except to supply food, and there is a shortage of food in the country to-day. Those who are best informed estimate that the crop is about 65 per cent to-day of a normal yield.

Why is it that wheat is $2.50 a bushel? Because the vessels that have been going across the ocean for the last seven months have been dumping it into the sea. So long as that condition exists wheat will keep going higher and higher. We have a splendid crop in view. I feel that we ought not to be hysterical about these matters. There is no reason why we can not raise fruit and cereals and beef and mutton enough for this country of ours. We are producing something in every section of this great country all the time. We have enough to feed ourselves and we have enough to feed our Army, and we have great quantities that we will be able to ship to the allies if properly conserved.

But what brought my attention particularly to this matter is this: There is a great shortage of tin plate in this country at this time. My friend from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] spoke of 20,000,000 cans per month. It is 20,000,000 cans every day, and that has been going on since the time when I introduced this bill.

Mr. THOMAS. I meant to have said 20,000,000 cans per day.

Mr. FERNALD. We are short on account of tin plate. Our factories are idle because of it.

Mr. THOMAS. I wish to set myself right as to the amount, if I said 20,000,000 cans a month.

Mr. FERNALD. Twenty million cans a day.

Mr. THOMAS. I stated it incorrectly.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will yield to me, I should be very glad if he would put into the RECORD the amount of tin plate that is exported to China and to other countries with which we are not at war, and the damaging effect that this constant exportation will have on the canning industry in this country.

Mr. FERNALD. I have already done that in the speech I made last week. I think you will find the figures there exactly. I have not them before me now. I gave the exact figures at that time.

As I recall it, about one-third of the tin plate manufactured in this country is shipped abroad. That is a very large quantity. We have only 12 tin-plate mills in this country; and let me say that yesterday the Secretary of Commerce called a meeting in this city of the tin-plate manufacturers, the tin manufacturers, the canners and packers of the country, and the wholesale grocers. They agreed that they would get great relief if this bill could be passed.

Mr. President, as I said, in this country we are going to plant this year every acre that is possible, but we have thousands and thousands of miles of seacoast that to-day produce millions and hundreds of millions of cases of fish that are not being packed for the want of tin plate. Those who are planting vegetables have not been able to plant the acreage they would have planted if they had known that the tin plate could be obtained from which cans needed in which to preserve their crop would be manufactured.

It has been suggested that something else might be used in the place of tin. It is impossible; there is nothing else that can be used in place of tin in a commercial way. If we used glass, the expense would be 600 per cent greater than it is with tin. There is no other way by which the canning process can be applied to many articles to keep. You understand the difficulty in shipping in glass. Every moment's delay is causing just that much less food to be produced in the country.

Now let me read, because you know, as in every crisis of the world's history, the first thing the first President of the United States did before he delivered his inaugural he called the business men of New York—April 28, 1798—together to get their ideas as to what should be done. The business men of this country are pretty good advisers on matters of this kind. I have had within two weeks, or since this bill was introduced, I will not say thousands, but I will say hundreds of letters and telegrams, and I think every Senator in this body must have received some advice from the people back home as to the tremendous advantage this bill would give them or the relief it would give them if passed immediately.

Here is a letter from a man who commands at least $50,000,000 worth of business in a year in canned goods. He says:

APRIL 27, 1917.

Hon. BERT M. FERNALD,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Mr. Gorrell has sent me a letter calling attention to Senate bill 1867, regarding tin plate. We are heartily in favor of this bill——

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. FERNALD. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KELLOGG. Does the bill say anything about tin plate?

Mr. FERNALD. No, sir.

Mr. KELLOGG. Is there any other bill that does?

Mr. FERNALD. I do not know that there is, but this covers it if it is enacted into law.

Mr. KELLOGG. Is it necessary to authorize the President to place an embargo on all the commerce of this country in order to stop the export of tin plate?

Mr. FERNALD. Not to stop the export of tin plate, but I assume there are many other things which would be affected, and it would perhaps be as beneficial as in the tin-plate industry. I do not know about that.

Mr. KELLOGG. There may be. I should like to be informed on the subject whether there are any other articles that should be embargoed at this time.

Mr. FERNALD. Permit me to read the balance of this letter:

We are heartily in favor of this bill, and will so write to our New York State Senators.

You will notice the language. This is from a man who represents something in the business world.

One of the great menaces to the packing of food this year is the threatened shortage of tin plate.

I am leaving for Washington on Monday afternoon to attend a meeting called by Secretary Redfield to discuss this tin-plate matter.

That is the meeting which was held yesterday. I have many other letters from packers all over the country.

Mr. GORE. I should like to ask the Senator the date of that letter?

Mr. FERNALD. April 27.

Mr. GORE. I should like to say in this connection that the Secretary of Agriculture came before the Committee on Agriculture a few days ago and stated that a few weeks since there was a threatened shortage of tin plate, but that he had taken it up with the various manufacturers of tin plate and those who handle the different successive processes, and he is confident that the situation will be met and the emergency or crisis averted in that regard.

Mr. FERNALD. I want to read to the Senator a letter from Secretary Houston which I have received. It is dated April 27, and is as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, April 27, 1917.

Hon. BERT M. FERNALD,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have your letter of April 26, in which you ask my views on Senate bill No. 1867, introduced by you, giving the President authority to direct exports from this country. I am heartily in favor of the bill. I was coming to the committee meeting Tuesday morning to give my personal indorsement of the bill, but was prevented from appearing by reason of very important developments here. I greatly hope that the bill will pass promptly.

Very sincerely,

D. F. HOUSTON, Secretary.

That is from Secretary Houston.

Let me say that at that time Secretary Houston did hope to intervene, and I think he has intervened. You must understand that there are great commercial interests in this country, and that the tin-plate manufacturers are likely to ship tin plate to the purchaser who will pay the highest price. They have large contracts in Asia. I do not recall exactly how much, but a large amount of tin plate that is manufactured to-day is being shipped to Asia to be used in the oil business. Those tin-plate men who have contracts abroad, unless relieved by law, will be obliged to fill those contracts; and unless we can retain sufficient in this country to manufacture the containers we need to cover the products we are raising here we might just as well be without the products themselves.

Let me say that this is no sectional matter. There is not a State in the Union that I recall but what has a canning factory, but what is able to conserve food, but what is able to produce large quantities of food. Last year there were more than 4,000,000,000 cans of food put up in this country, and this year if we were assured of containers there will be more than 6,000,000,000 cans. We are losing enough every day to feed an army of 5,000 men for a day. We have already wasted 15 days since this bill was introduced, and I say it has the indorsement of all the departments, and I believe there is nothing we can enact into law which will so help all conditions. We have not only got to feed our Army and send the goods abroad, but we have got to feed the people at home. Prices have been constantly advancing until they are now out of reach of the common people, and we are likely to have trouble in our own country unless we can relieve the situation.

I am rather old-fashioned, but I believe that the least interruption, the least embarrassment we can give the business men of this country, the better it will be for the entire country. I believe all lines of business could be carried on in the usual way. I believe every manager of every great business in this country would manage it better than a new man. Already there is an unsettled condition—some lines of business have been closed down—and I believe it is the duty of the Senate to enact such laws as will relieve present conditions. This is not a drastic measure; it is not a severe measure; it simply gives the President the authority in time of war to direct the shipments of this country and to retain such goods as may be necessary for the welfare of our people. I hope this particular section will have the approval of the Senate and be given enactment at this session.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not know whether anyone else wishes to go on to-day. I will ask an order for a recess, if no one desires to speak to-day.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Before we take a recess, may I make a parliamentary inquiry? There has been some difference of opinion, and for that reason the inquiry is made.

It is my intention to move, when the appropriate time comes and the bill is in the Senate, to strike out all that portion of pages 8 and 9 embraced within the parenthetical (c)—the portion upon which argument was had when the bill was before the Senate. It was suggested that it would be necessary, in order that that motion might ultimately be entertained, that the right be reserved. If that be so, I wish to give the requisite notice to the Senator from North Carolina and advise him that I reserve the right and will then make the appropriate motion.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator has the right to make the motion at any time before the bill goes into the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. No; I wish to make it after the bill goes into the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has a right to make it in the Senate.

Mr. OVERMAN. He has a right to make it in the Senate; and he gives notice that he will make it then?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Yes, sir.

Mr. OVERMAN. He can make it at any time without a notice. Does the Senator from California desire to speak further?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I simply wanted to make the inquiry.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand that some Senators desire an executive session. I therefore ask unanimous consent for an order that, instead of adjourning this afternoon, we shall take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hardly knows how to put that request.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will make the motion later. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, May 3, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 2, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Rev. H. L. Haywood, of Waterloo, Iowa, offered the following prayer:

O Lord, our God and Father Almighty, Architect of our own and our Nation's destiny, we pause this moment in the beginning of these deliberations to quiet our minds in order the better to hear those eternal voices which speak within us, ever reminding us of our duties and of that high and haunting ideal which is embodied in our country. Grant to these Thy servants, Representatives of a multitudinous people and stewards of a vast responsibility, that wisdom which can alone come from sources higher than human. And may they, and we all, be reminded, while they seek to secure the internal safety of the land, of that All-Seeing Eye which maintains an everlasting espionage over the most secret thoughts and motives of our hearts. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE COMMISSIONERS OF THE ALLIES.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state to the House that in accordance with the direction of the House yesterday he addressed a letter to the British commissioners, and also to the French commissioners, extending to them an invitation to visit the House of Representatives. Hon. Henry H. White a few moments ago telephoned that the French commissioners would like to come here to-morrow at about 12 o'clock, as they are going to leave the city at 3 o'clock. That being the case, the Chair suggests that some gentleman ask unanimous consent that the House meet to-morrow earlier than 12 o'clock.

Mr. KINCHELOE rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the allied commissioners are to visit the House of Representatives to-morrow at about 12 o'clock, I rise to suggest that unless some arrangement is made with respect to the galleries our immediate families will have to come here at sunup in order to get into the galleries.

Mr. MANN. I take it there will be two tickets issued by the Doorkeeper to each Member, as is customary.

The SPEAKER. People will be admitted to the galleries on cards. The Doorkeeper will have the cards.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolutions of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 43. Joint resolution making available the $200,000 appropriation for irrigation purposes on the Yakima Indian Reservation, State of Washington, carried in the Indian appropriation act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918; and

S. J. Res. 31. Joint resolution to increase food crops in the United States.

The message also announced that the President had, on April 30, 1917, approved and signed bill of the following title:

S. 1800. An act to amend an act approved June 29, 1906, and entitled "An act to authorize the Grand Lodge of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows of the District of Columbia to sell, hold, and convey certain real estate."

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

WAR EXPENSES.

The SPEAKER. By agreement entered into yesterday the vote will now be taken on the bill (H. R. 3971) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the Military and Naval Establishments on account of war expenses for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes. The question is on passing the bill.

The question was taken.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on passing the bill H. R. 3971.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 362, nays 1, not voting 69, as follows:

Mr. BLACKMON with Mr. SMITH of Idaho.
Mr. SCULLY with Mr. PORTER.
Mr. DALE of New York with Mr. DAVIS.
Mr. STERLING of Pennsylvania with Mr. WASON.
Mr. SULLIVAN with Mr. ROGERS.
Mr. TALBOTT with Mr. ROWLAND.
Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado with Mr. SANFORD.
Mr. VENABLE with Mr. SCOTT of Pennsylvania.
Mr. WISE with Mr. SLEMP.
Mr. BRODBECK with Mr. BACHARACH.
Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina with Mr. BRITTEN.
Mr. CALDWELL with Mr. VOIGT.
Mr. DOOLING with Mr. CAPSTICK.
Mr. DOUGHTON with Mr. CRAGO.
Mr. FISHER with Mr. DUNN.
Mr. FLYNN with Mr. EDMONDS.
Mr. GALLIVAN with Mr. GEORGE W. FAIRCHILD.
Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina with Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD.
Mr. KEY of Ohio with Mr. GILLETT.
Mr. LEA of California with Mr. GOODALL.
Mr. MCANDREWS with Mr. GOULD.
Mr. MAHER with Mr. GRIEST.
Mr. MARTIN of Illinois with Mr. HAMILTON of New York.
Mr. MOON with Mr. HAYES.
Mr. NEELY with Mr. HEATON.
Mr. PRICE with Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota.
Mr. RAGSDALE with Mr. JOHNSON of Washington.
Mr. ROBINSON with Mr. KIESS of Pennsylvania.
Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana with Mr. KREIDER.
Mr. SHACKLEFORD with Mr. MCARTHUR.
Mr. CHARLES B. SMITH with Mr. MILLER of Washington.
Mr. THOMAS F. SMITH with Mr. NELSON.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call my name.

The name of Mr. CLARK of Missouri was called, and he answered "Aye."

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. SMITH of Idaho, is prevented from being present to-day because of the critical illness of his son.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. SHERLEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors.

SEIZURE OF GERMAN INTERNED SHIPS.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Missouri rise?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 62, authorizing the President to take over for the United States the possession and title of vessels of any subject or citizen of any nation with which the United States may be at war, and for other purposes. This is intended to authorize the President of the United States to take over the German interned ships. It is a matter of vital importance. It passed the Senate day before yesterday; the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries reported out the House resolution yesterday unanimously, and in order to facilitate the passage of the resolution struck out the text of the House resolution and inserted the text of the Senate resolution by way of amendment, and I am hoping we may take up the House resolution and substitute the Senate resolution for it and pass it to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 62. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this resolution was reported yesterday, was not in print until this morning, and no copies are now available on the floor. The gentleman from Missouri conferred with me a little while ago, and I asked him, in view of the condition, not to ask to call up the bill to-day. I am rather surprised that he has. If gentlemen think they are going to pass bills through the House without any consideration at all, they are mistaken. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

ESPIONAGE.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill H. R. 291, which I understand to be the unfinished business of the House, known as the espionage and neutrality bill.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman calls that up on the call of the committees.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the committees.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WEBB. When we adjourned on Monday afternoon this bill was still under consideration, and was only laid aside yesterday morning because of the privileged bill from the Committee on Appropriations. I desire to inquire whether it is in order that this bill should be taken up now?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will withhold, we can get to it in half a minute.

Mr. MANN. It only comes up on the call of the committees.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the committees.

The Clerk called the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill H. R. 291, generally known as the espionage or neutrality bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 291) to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not know how much time remains to the gentleman from North Carolina or the gentleman from Minnesota, but I would suggest to the gentleman from North Carolina that he now ask unanimous consent that his time be extended two hours and that the time of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] be extended two hours.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to make that request if there is that much time desired and will be occupied by Members.

Mr. MANN. Well, if it is not occupied——

Mr. WEBB. It can be turned back. I make the request, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt there will be further requests for time.

Mr. WEBB. I make the request, Mr. Speaker, that two hours be extended to my colleague on the committee [Mr. VOLSTEAD] and two hours to myself, to be controlled by us, respectively——

Mr. MANN. In addition to the time remaining.

Mr. WEBB. In addition to the time remaining. I have none remaining, but my friend Mr. VOLSTEAD has some.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that in addition to the time remaining to those gentlemen who did not use their hour that general debate be limited to four hours, half to be controlled by himself——

Mr. MANN. This is not a limitation of general debate, Mr. Speaker. It is simply extending the time of the gentleman from Minnesota two hours and the time of the gentleman from North Carolina two hours.

The SPEAKER. That the time be extended four hours, half of it to be controlled by the gentleman from North Carolina and the other half by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. EAGLE, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for 10 days, on account of illness in his family.

LEAVE TO VOTE.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. SABATH. I ask unanimous consent that I may be recorded "yea" on the last bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] asks unanimous consent that he may be recorded "yea" on the bill just passed. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, that request can not be submitted to the House under the rules. If he did not vote, there is no way of voting.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objects.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ESPIONAGE.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I ask that my colleague [Mr. VOLSTEAD] use some of his time if he is ready.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, this bill, H. R. 291, is commonly known as the "spy" bill or the espionage bill. It is a long bill and covers a number of subjects. It was before the Sixty-fourth Congress and should have been passed before that Congress adjourned, March 4 last.

The measure has been widely discussed and severely critized. In my judgment, much of this has been done by those who have had no correct knowledge of the provisions of the bill.

The main criticism upon the bill has centered upon the first four sections of Title I of the bill.

That we may have a clear idea of these sections, I wish to present a summary of the first three sections, as follows:

SECTION 1. Whoever, with intent to injure the United States, obtains or attempts to obtain any information relating to the national defense, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 20 years, or by both.

SEC. 2. Whoever, with intent to injure the United States, communicates to any foreign government any information relating to the national defense shall be punished, (a) in time of peace, by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment by not more than 20 years, or both; (b) in time of war, by imprisonment for not more than 30 years or by death.

SEC. 3. Whoever, having possession of information relating to the national defense, willfully and without proper authority, communicates or attempts to communicate such information to any person, or fails to deliver same to the person lawfully entitled to possession thereof, or through gross negligence permits the same to be removed from its proper place of custody or to be lost, stolen, or destroyed, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than five years, or by both.

Section 4 of Title I of the bill in full is as follows:

During any national emergency resulting from a war to which the United States is a party, or from threat of such a war, the President may, by proclamation, declare the existence of such emergency and, by proclamation, prohibit the publishing or communicating of, or the attempting to publish or communicate any information relating to the national defense which, in his judgment, is of such character that it is or might be useful to the enemy. Whoever violates any such prohibition shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 10 years, or both: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to limit or restrict any discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives or the publication of the same.

Section 4 has been criticized by the press on the ground that it is in conflict with the first amendment to the Constitution, which provides:

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

I do not now intend to enter into any lengthy discussion on the freedom of the press at this time, but I will call attention to the fact that the section will be in effect only in war, or when a national emergency exists caused by the imminence of war, and that it in no way limits or restricts any discussion of, comment upon, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives. I will discuss the freedom of the press later on in my remarks.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that this bill should be passed at the earliest date possible. The Judiciary Committee has given a large amount of time to its consideration. No two members of the committee perhaps would agree upon the phraseology of a single section of this bill. We had many different minds on the matter. I presume when this bill comes up before the House for amendment, and as well as upon its final passage, there will be a like division of opinion and sentiment upon it.

I wish to make some general observations upon the bill rather than to discuss the phraseology of the various sections. Very much, I think, depends upon the attitude of mind with which we approach the consideration of the bill. If a man approaches this bill with the idea that there is something dangerous in it; that there are provisions in here which infringe upon the rights of American citizens under the Constitution, he, of course, will approach it with a critic's eye. He will be looking for defects, and a man usually finds what he is looking for. He will magnify what defects there are and the chances are that he will see imaginary defects which are creatures of his own mind and do not really exist.

The man who approaches the consideration of this bill with that attitude of mind will probably vote against it. In the consideration of this bill we should have in our minds the circumstances which have led to the bringing of it into Congress and which have created the demand for its enactment into law.

Go back two and one-half years ago, when the great war in Europe began. This country declared itself to be a neutral power. But as that war went on this Nation found that in many respects our Government was not in a position to properly protect the neutrality of the United States or to carry out its obligation as a neutral Nation. We found also that the conditions which developed here in our own land were such that many crimes were committed in the United States which this Government was powerless to punish by reason of the lack of law. Things were becoming worse and worse until the aggressions of the Imperial Government of Germany became so great that war with that nation was imminent. And then another stage came, by which we are to-day actually at war with that great military power.

Now, those were the circumstances, those were the conditions, that created the demand for the enactment of this measure. We should keep this in mind. The object of this bill is to enable the United States to discharge its duties as a neutral power with other nations at war and enable it when war is imminent to protect the rights of its own citizens, the property of its own citizens, and to punish those crimes which are dangerous to our peace and welfare and our honor.

Then let us approach this bill with the proper attitude of mind. The object is not to restrict an American citizen in any just right he has under the Constitution and laws of this Nation. On the other hand, it is to guard and protect those rights, to maintain the honor of the United States, to enable the United States to discharge its duties as a neutral between belligerent nations, and to provide for the general welfare, to conserve and protect our American free institutions and insure the perpetuation of the Nation. In other words, this is a war measure. It is true there are some provisions which apply only in time of peace, but in the main those provisions which apply only in time of peace are for the purpose of guarding and protecting our national defense. I do not mean by that that the laws and the Constitution should be set at naught during war; but I do mean that in time of war, in time of danger, in time of great national peril, it is necessary sometimes that individual citizens shall be willing to surrender some of the privileges which they have for the sake of the greater good. So this is a war measure, and we should proceed to its consideration with that important fact in mind.

Now, what is the source of this measure? It comes from three great departments of this Government—from the Attorney General, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Navy. Why, some gentlemen seem to approach this bill with the idea that for this reason the bill demands greater scrutiny and more careful examination. Such gentlemen proceed with the idea that the heads of these great departments are trying to "put something over" on Congress and obtain power which would enable them to punish innocent citizens and deprive good, loyal citizens of their just rights. We ought not to assume that attitude. The cry has been, "Stand by the President!" but the heads of these great departments represent the President, represent the Chief Executive of this Nation.

More than that, the heads of these departments, by virtue of their positions, are the men who have come in contact with the facts and conditions and circumstances which make these laws necessary. They have been charged with the duty of hunting down, arresting, and prosecuting criminals, and with the duty of maintaining the proper relations with foreign nations. They are experts on these lines. They give their time and attention to these matters. They are under oath to discharge their duties faithfully. They come to Congress and say, "From our studies of these questions, from our efforts to enforce the law, to maintain the rights of the United States, to enable it to discharge its duties and functions and obligations to other nations, these laws and these provisions are necessary." We should remember that fact. We ought to trust those great Cabinet officers who have the responsibility of carrying out the laws and protecting the rights of citizens and who are the chosen agents of the President.

This is to be a criminal statute largely. Who is it to affect? The law-abiding citizen? Not at all. It is intended only to affect the criminal classes. And we have them in the United States. You know that we talk about recruiting our Navy up to 100,000 or more men.

We have, in round numbers, 100,000 men in the Federal and State penitentiaries throughout the United States. We have probably double that number in the minor prisons. We have our criminal classes. Here in the United States also are several thousand aliens, citizens of foreign nations. We have the right to assume that some of these aliens are unfriendly to the United States in the great struggle in which we are now engaged. Now, then, it is to control and subdue these criminal classes, these men who are unfriendly to the United States, these men who perhaps are not citizens and who would not hesitate to hinder our success in this war. I repeat it is the criminal classes that this act is intended to deter from crime, and to punish if they violate the law.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman state how the criminal classes will obtain information of military movements?

Mr. MORGAN. Well, many of the criminals are as intelligent as any other class of citizens; they would have the same opportunity to get information as would a law-abiding citizen.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Would the gentleman infer from that, that the War Department and the Navy Department will hand out all this information that they have indiscriminately?

Mr. MORGAN. Well, I should hope not.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Why, then, put it in the bill?

Mr. MORGAN. Well, according to the ideas of some Members it is a crime for the Navy Department or the War Department to refuse to give out full and complete information about the doings of the Army and the Navy and the plans that they may have.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. This bill is not intended to curb the War Department or the Navy Department from giving out information. It is to curb other people from giving information. If the Navy Department or the War Department does not give out this information—and it is expected they will not—how are these criminal classes to get the information, so that they can impart it?

Mr. MORGAN. What is the object of the criminal law? It is to deter men from committing crime——

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. And to reform the criminal.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; and to reform the criminal. That is one of the objects. Now the War Department or the Navy Department may refuse to give out information, but there are men who in their endeavor and desire to get that information to help the enemy will resort to all kinds of destructive activities, perhaps even going to the length of taking life in the endeavor to get that information. Yet ordinarily there would be no technical crime in their doing some of those acts, and so the object of this law is to make such an action a criminal offense. It is based upon the principle that all criminal statutes are based upon, in our Nation and in all the States. [Applause.] I say, therefore, that the very object is not only to punish the men, but it is to deter and prevent men from making an effort to acquire this information, which might result in injury to the United States.

Now, it is said that innocent people may suffer if this bill is enacted into law. Well, if that were a good excuse for preventing us from enacting this criminal law, then we should never enact a criminal statute in State or Nation, and we should repeal those that are already in force. We have a law against murder, though we know that there is a possibility of some innocent man suffering death under that penalty. We have laws against many other kinds of crime, and yet we know that there is a possibility that some innocent man will suffer. So it is readily seen that that objection is not sound. In times like these, when the Nation's very life and existence hang in the balance, suppose some individual does suffer a wrong.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Do I understand the gentleman thinks the existence of this Nation now hangs in the balance? Is he referring to our country?

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, we have full faith and confidence in our hearts that this war will terminate in victory for the United States. But the fortunes of war can never be foretold. When nations are engaged in war, no man can say what will be the end or when it will come. This is to strengthen our national fabric. Think of it! We had even in the last Congress, in our preparedness measures, to increase our Army and Navy Establishments, and we appropriated vast millions of dollars——

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. In just a moment. We enacted laws placing on our people taxes unheard of in the country since the days of the Civil War.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Before the gentleman concludes his remarks, does he intend to discuss section 4?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes. I am coming to that.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I will be glad to hear it.

Mr. MORGAN. And yet we have now in this Congress gone far beyond that limit. Of the taxes that we are going to impose on the people, every man, woman, and child in the United States will feel the effect. Our boys are out on battleships ready to meet the enemy, and they know not when their lives will be taken. If we get into this war, either here on our own soil or over in Europe, our boys will be at the front facing the dangers of battle. And yet there are some men at home—some of our own citizens—who are not perhaps making any sacrifice at all, while the men at the front are giving their all, risking their all, giving up their last drop of blood. Under those circumstances should we be afraid that some man at home will have to sacrifice some little right or be subject to some inconvenience?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will my colleague yield?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would like to know if there is anything in this bill that would cover a case of this kind: A resident of Philadelphia, whose family I know very well, starting in his motor boat on our inland waterways, with maps furnished to him by the Government, is arrested at New Orleans as a German spy. His ancestors came over with William Penn. There is no question about his being an American, but he is seized because he happens to have in his possession maps of inland waterways. That is all. Does the bill propose to hold men traveling over the waterways of the United States on business purposes or for pleasure because they may chance to arouse the suspicion of persons on the banks who may happen to observe their passing?

Mr. MORGAN. That illustrates the case that I am just talking about. There may be innocent men put to some inconvenience——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In answering the question I wish the gentleman would consider the case of American citizens going about their business who may have automobile road maps or waterway maps in their possession and the possibility of their being arrested and held under suspicion by anybody who may have the notion that a German spy is hidden behind every tree.

Mr. MORGAN. That illustrates the point. It may be that innocent men will be put to some inconvenience; but, Mr. Speaker, under conditions of war every man in some way must make some sacrifice, and a man who does nothing more than to be placed at some inconvenience certainly can not complain. But under this bill no man can be convicted under sections 1 and 2 unless he obtains this information with the intent to injure the United States; and under his right of a fair trial before an impartial jury in the courts of this land certainly all of his rights would be protected.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. MORGAN. Will the gentleman be brief, please?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will. Suppose a man is sawing wood in his own cellar or, being of an inventive turn of mind, is working at some contrivance, and the man next door gets it into his head that a German spy is working in that cellar. Is there anything in this bill which protects that man against arrest upon the mere suspicion of his neighbor?

Mr. MORGAN. No. Neither is there anything to protect a man from the suspicion of being a criminal under our State laws or under our national laws to-day. Men are wrongfully suspected under every criminal law on the National or State statute books, and it will be just so under this; but a man who is a true and loyal citizen, whose intentions toward this Nation are right and proper, need not fear that he will be convicted and sent to prison unjustly and unfairly. As a rule, it is not true and loyal men who are afraid of suspicion. As a rule, it is those who ought to be suspected.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I grant the gentleman that; but suppose a man is nailing up a box of applies or potatoes in his barn, and a man outside thinks he is putting a bomb inside the box, is he subject to arrest because some neighbor has a grudge against him?

Mr. MORGAN. I can not yield further.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I thought the gentleman would answer. He is familiar with the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. Some one asked me about section 4 of this bill, which relates to the publication of matters concerning the national defense. It is the portion of the bill which strikes the great newspapers of this Nation, and some of them have indicated a fear lest they would not be able to perform their proper functions in this Government, and perhaps would be imposed on; in other words, that under this law there would be an abridgment of the liberty of the press. I read the other day in some newspaper—I think it was a Chicago paper—where the editor said that even though Congress should pass this law, that paper would publish what it thought was in the interest of the public, and take the chances of punishment. I think I read in this morning's paper that a man in England announced that he might take the chances of being punished under the defense of the realm act, in order that he might accomplish some good. I could have nothing but admiration for an editor who, in the face of a possibility of being tried and imprisoned, would still publish that which he thought was in the interest of his country. He would be a hero, a martyr, and all praise to such editors as that. But how about other classes of editors who will probably publish matter not in the interest of the United States, not to the glory of the country, not to strengthen and encourage our armies at the front and help the boys to fight their battles—not for that purpose, but for some selfish, unpatriotic, disloyal purpose? Down forever with such editors as that!

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. For a very short question, please.

Mr. RANDALL. I will make it very short. The exact language of the Constitution is:

> Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. RANDALL. Now, the exact language of section 4 of this bill is:

> The President may prohibit the publication of information which, in his judgment——

Now, does the gentleman think that that language involves any abridgment of the freedom of the press?

Mr. MORGAN. I think not. Now let me call your attention to this fact: I would be the last one to vote for any law that I thought would restrict the true liberty of the press of this Nation. You are familiar with the long history of the struggle for the development of the liberty of the press. It is considered a paramount necessity in a free government to have a free press, but the men who wrote our Constitution met in the Constitutional Convention, behind closed doors, and did not allow the press to publish their proceedings. The men who said this Congress shall not abridge the liberty of the press sat in that convention with closed doors. That is the way they interpreted the liberty of the press, and the Senate of the United States sat for five years in secret session, not allowing their debates to be published. That was the conception of our forefathers of the right of Congress or of the Nation to withhold information which they thought was not in the interest of the public.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan and Mr. CHANDLER of New York rose.

Mr. MORGAN. I will yield first to the gentleman from Michigan, who has been standing some time.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I should like to inquire of the gentleman whether, under this section, it might be impossible to arouse public opinion to a point where a weakness even in our military system could be corrected.

Mr. MORGAN. That is true. I say the liberty of the press ought not to be restricted.

Why, my friends, the press of the country is the great power that rules this Government. How? We say that the House of Representatives has power; we say that the Senate of the United States has power; we say that the Executive has power; we say that the judiciary has power; but what is the great power that controls this legislation? It is public sentiment and public opinion. Who makes and molds the public sentiment of this country? It is the great newspapers of this country.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CARAWAY). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. MORGAN. You and I as individual Representatives to-day have no such power as the editors of great newspapers. They to-day mold public sentiment, and public sentiment rules the world. How was this military bill passed here a few days ago in this House? The newspapers created public sentiment of the Nation, and the public sentiment was reflected back to the Members of this House, and men here changed their minds, changed their ideas of what was right and what was best, followed public sentiment of the Nation and adopted a system of conscription in raising an army.

Oh, what power the press has! We want the press to continue in that power; we do not want to restrict or change it, and there is no intention to do that.

Mr. KING. I would like to ask whether this section 4 would prohibit the publication of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD?

Mr. MORGAN. I think not.

Mr. KING. Why not?

Mr. LITTLE. Suppose the President, in his judgment, thought it ought to be suppressed, how about that?

Mr. MORGAN. It might be a good thing to do. [Laughter.]

Mr. KING. Does the gentleman think that it could be done?

Mr. MORGAN. No; I do not. If he should attempt it Congress might repeal the law, if it depended on the law.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. I have been informed that Mr. Creel, of the Censor Board, stated at the Press Club the other night that in the event of the passage of this bill it might become necessary to restrict the publication of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at times.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know about that; we have a right to have a secret session if we want to. If it becomes necessary in the interest of the public welfare we could have a secret session even if we were criticized at home.

Now, as I said in the beginning, let us get the right attitude toward this bill. Do not approach it with the idea that there is something dangerous to our liberties and that if it is passed free speech and a free press and our rights under the laws of nations will at one stroke be annihilated. It is not that. The object of the bill is, as I said at the beginning, to strengthen the arm of the Government in a time of war and in a time of stress and in a time of peril. This bill ought to pass.

As to the mere language of some sections, the committee, as a rule, are indifferent about that. We can not agree among ourselves, and you will not agree when you come to vote on your amendments. Nevertheless, what we want is that the bill shall be left in such strength that in this great emergency, the future of which no man can foresee or foretell, we shall in every way strengthen the Government: that we shall make the judiciary and the courts and the Department of Justice a power that will strengthen the Army and the Navy, that will help the boys at the front, and that will aid this Nation to win a glorious victory, the influence of which will live on and on through the ages and be a blessing to all mankind. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask the chairman if we can not reach some agreement in reference to the consideration of the bill and amendments to the bill.

Mr. WEBB. I hope that we can.

Mr. MANN. Under the rules of the House, this being a bill on the House Calendar, any gentleman, especially the gentleman in charge of the bill, can demand the previous question at any time. Of course the House would not have to order it, but if it did it would cut out amendments. Otherwise, a man offers an amendment, and if he does it before he makes his speech he has an hour's time. If we should proceed on that theory and amendments were offered, we could not finish the bill in a month. What are the principal controversies over the bill?

Mr. WEBB. Title I and Title XI.

Mr. MANN. Why not ask unanimous consent that general debate, so called, on the bill shall be exhausted at a certain time, and after that Titles I and XI shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule?

Mr. WEBB. I think that is a good suggestion. I think it will strike the House as being reasonable and give everybody a chance to offer amendments and to say what he pleases about the amendments and the sections.

Mr. MANN. I think possibly the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] has a demand for more time in general debate than he has remaining. Does the gentleman from North Carolina expect to use all of his time?

Mr. WEBB. I doubt it very much; we have only one or two more speeches.

Mr. MANN. Would the gentleman from North Carolina be able to yield to the gentleman from Minnesota a part of his time?

Mr. WEBB. I will if I can. It is hard just now to tell how much I will have. I will be as generous and fair as I can to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MANN. Suppose we give the gentleman from Minnesota a half an hour more and then ask unanimous consent that Titles I and XI shall be read under the five-minute rule.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I make that request. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Minnesota be allowed 30 minutes more than he now has for general debate, and that Titles I and XI at the end of the general debate shall be considered under the five-minute rule for amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. If that consent is agreed to, would that foreclose amendments to any other title of the bill?

Mr. WEBB. No; I think not.

Mr. STAFFORD. I assume that if any Member has a meritorious amendment the gentleman would permit discussion of that amendment without moving the previous question.

Mr. WEBB. I shall not use any tactics to unduly force the bill through the House against the wishes of Members. I take it, however, that every Member will help to facilitate its passage.

Mr. MANN. I suggest that the gentleman make the request in this way, that the time of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] be extended for 30 minutes over the time now allotted to him, and that at the expiration of the time now allotted to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] for general debate, Titles I and XI shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. If that request should be agreed to, it would still leave the gentleman from North Carolina the right to move the previous question at that time, in order to allow amendments to be offered to the other sections of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate be extended 30 minutes, that that time be awarded to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD], and that at the expiration of the time for general debate Titles I and XI be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. Is there objection?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will that preclude members of the committee hereafter from being heard upon the general merits of the bill under the usual practice and custom?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As the Chair understands it, it would leave it within the power of the gentleman from North Carolina to move the previous question at any time and, of course, in that way cut off debate on other titles. Whether or not he would do that the Chair does not know.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. If he does not move the previous question, the matter will then still remain open for general debate?

Mr. MANN. This is not fixing the time for general debate, but yielding additional time for general debate and providing for what is not now under the rules in order, namely, that Titles I and XI shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. Otherwise no portion of the bill would be read for amendment at all. A Member who gets the floor can offer an amendment at any time.

Mr. RANDALL. To any section?

Mr. MANN. This is a House Calendar bill.

Mr. RANDALL. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to understand the right of a Member to offer an amendment to any other section. Will his right be cut off by the motion of the chairman of the committee to order the previous question?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would say to the gentleman from California that this is a House Calendar bill, not a Union Calendar bill. It is not considered in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and it is not read for amendment under the five-minute rule. In fact, it is not read for amendment at all. Any gentleman getting the floor is entitled to offer an amendment under the rules of the House, and he can discuss it for an hour if he desires, which would mean, of course, that not many Members would have the opportunity to present amendments. Under the arrangement that is proposed Titles I and XI will be read for amendment under the five-minute rule, and if the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] moves the previous question at the end of the reading of Title XI and the House orders the previous question there would be no opportunity to offer amendments to any other section of the bill; but that would be within the discretion of the House.

Mr. WEBB. This arrangement will really serve to liberalize the rules of the House which apply to the consideration of a bill on the House Calendar.

Mr. MANN. It will give a much wider latitude to offer amendments under the rules than now exists.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection, under the statement of the chairman of the committee that he has no intention of precluding any other amendments to the other sections of the bill.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, Title XII has reference to the courts. I think some of these offenses ought to be tried by court-martial.

Mr. WEBB. The gentleman can offer that amendment if he desires, but this is a civil bill providing for trial in the courts of the United States by juries. A court-martial has nothing to do with these sections and ought not to have.

Mr. McCORMICK. Are not courts-martial competent to deal with these problems under military law?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; whenever military law prevails; but we are passing a law here to be administered by the civil courts of the United States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I now yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK].

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. Speaker, I trust that I shall not tax the House with all of the time allotted to me, but I wish to suggest to the Members that the bill as reported is more drastic than the bill reported to the Senate. The bill, as I am advised, is not less drastic than the present English law, with this very marked difference, that this bill, if it were to become a law, would be the law 3,000 miles, and presumably 30 days by mail, from the enemy country, whereas Great Britain is within 48 or 60 hours of the enemy. The censor will control the cable and the wireless stations, and matter published—and when I say "published" I mean by word of mouth or by print—in this country would not be transmitted directly to the enemy country except by leave of the censor at the cable or the wireless station. The bill as it now stands, as I read it—and I have read it and read it a second time to determine if it has a meaning other than that which I understand—the bill authorizes the President by proclamation to prohibit the publishing, and so forth, of any information relating to the national defense which in his judgment might be useful to the enemy. Patently the President of the United States is not going to draw the regulations originally or amend them subsequently. Before we began the addition to his burdens in this Congress he was already the most overworked public official in the world. These regulations and their subsequent amendment must be made by officials in the Department of War, and therefore it will be their judgment which will determine what relates to the national defense and what may be of such character that it might be useful to the enemy.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman states they will likely be determined by officials of the War Department. I would ask him if he does not think they would be drawn by officials of the Department of Justice? I will say to the gentleman that the Department of Justice sent us the bill originally.

Mr. McCORMICK. Then I would suggest that if they are drawn by the Department of Justice it will be upon the initiative and with the approval of the Department of War, because the War Department will determine what information, if divulged, would be calculated to help the enemy.

Mr. DYER. It will be a cooperation between them, naturally.

Mr. McCORMICK. There will be cooperation.

Now, at the present moment, for example, there is a not inconsiderable amount of infectious disease among the new recruits in the Navy, embarrassing but not alarming. No publication of that has been made, though it might have been made under the law. But suppose there were serious infection among these recruits? Suppose that in the great camp to be established at Springfield, Mass., there were an epidemic of typhoid fever? Under this bill, as I understand it, no man, except by the leave of the department, could publish the fact that an epidemic of typhoid existed among the troops at Springfield. Of what advantage the permission contained in the proviso if there might be no utterance of the facts upon which discussion, comment, or criticism must be based? Let me illustrate further. It has been alleged and denied that the chief of the French military mission made certain requests which were deleted by the censor from his remarks. But, granting that they were not deleted by the censor, such requests could not be made public if forbidden under this act, and are they of a character which would require publication under such contingencies? Gen. Joffre has said, for example, that American troops ought to proceed forthwith to France. He said that an army division should consist not of twenty-some thousand but of 9,000 men. He has said that a military company, because of the requirements of modern warfare, should consist of 250 and not of 150 men. Now, let us conceive that possible, being human, the gentlemen in the War Department might hesitate for some time to acquiesce in the suggestion that the company unit be 250 instead of 150 men. It would imply that their testimony of two years ago was in error. It would imply that when they had an opportunity to revise the size of the company unit in recent legislation they had failed to do so. The increase of the size of the company would involve the increase in the number of lieutenants but no increase in the number of captains, and gentlemen in responsible positions in the military service of the United States have suggested to me that the reason the department had failed to make the important recommendation that a company comprise 250 and not 150 men was that such a change would increase only the number of second lieutenants but not the number of captains. I refer to this only by way of illustration. It might very well be that supplies, ammunition, clothing, foodstuffs for the troops, either here or across the ocean, were defective or unsuited to their service, and yet it seems perfectly clear that publication of the fact that such supplies were defective or unsuitable might be forbidden under the language of the bill.

Mr. BURNETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMICK. I will.

Mr. BURNETT. If conditions like the embalmed-beef scandal in the Spanish-American War should arise, and the press of the country should undertake to comment on it, and to bring it to the attention of the people of the country, what would happen?

Mr. McCORMICK. Not merely the press, but neither the gentleman nor I could publish the facts on the street corner, lest the United States marshal might take us in.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMICK. I will.

Mr. PLATT. Does the gentleman think the publication of such information could be properly construed as of any advantage to the enemy?

Mr. McCORMICK. I would assume that it would be in the discretion of the Executive to state what was of use to the enemy.

Mr. PLATT. Of course, there is no——

Mr. McCORMICK. Let me refer the gentleman to the interrogation of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] regarding embalmed beef and supplies furnished troops. It was Lord Northcliffe who first learned absolutely from the general in command of the forces in the field that the munitions supplied by the department in England were unsuitable and that because they were unsuitable the British troops suffered horrible losses of life. Lord Northcliffe violated the law, one in terms like this bill, and made public the facts and contributed, I was going to say, not less than Lord Kitchener to the subsequent victories on the western front. This bill, gentlemen, if it becomes law, will affect you and me, affect other individuals who may come in possession of important information, the publication of which has been forbidden. It will very little affect the newspapers of this country comparable in importance with those published by Lord Northcliffe. I know, for I was in the business until five or six years ago. Such newspaper, when the situation became grave enough would employ able counsel and defy the Government—as individuals could not—defy the administration with great increase in the confidence which the public reposed in them. That defiance in the long run would be worth far more than the cost of the prosecution and its defense. There is no menace in this bill to the great newspapers which would violate the law and defy the Government if there were conditions which demanded publication, but there is a menace to the small newspapers whose columns are important channels of communication to the great American public, and there is more menace still to the individual who might discover that this or another feature of the administration in the war was at fault.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMICK. I will.

Mr. JAMES. What would have happened if this bill had been in effect in 1898 when some private wrote to his mother in regard to the embalmed beef and the other things, and she had given it to a newspaper, and the local paper had printed the article?

Mr. McCORMICK. She might have been pinched by the deputy marshal.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMICK. I will.

Mr. DYER. Under the section to which the gentleman is referring—I take it it is section 4——

Mr. McCORMICK. I am.

Mr. DYER. There is a provision there which says:

That nothing in this section shall be construed to limit or restrict any discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives, or the publication of the same.

Does not the gentleman think that is an ample protection for the criticism of public officials in a beef scandal or anything of that kind?

Mr. McCORMICK. Let me ask the gentleman from Missouri to what does the phrase "or the publication of the same" refer? To the preceding language of the proviso, I think.

Mr. DYER. No; I do not think so.

Mr. McCORMICK. To what does it refer? If it does not refer to the preceding language of the proviso it nullifies all the other language of the section, and that would be a reductio ad absurdum. But if it applies, as I think, to the preceding language of the proviso, then discussion, comment, or criticism would be valueless, because you might be forbidden to state the fact upon which to base discussion.

Mr. DYER. Would the gentleman state what, in his opinion, would make this section absolutely clear that it is not the intention of Congress to prevent the newspapers from publishing facts or acts of the Government officials, referring to the question of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES] as to the Spanish War embalmed-beef question? I do not think there is any desire on the part of the framers of this bill to prohibit the publication.

Mr. McCORMICK. The gentleman will understand that I do not impute that to the committee.

Mr. DYER. And I am very sure from what the President said he does not want that.

Mr. IGOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMICK. I will.

Mr. IGOE. Does the gentleman think there ought to be any restriction at all upon the publication of matter that might be useful to the enemy?

Mr. McCORMICK. I think that is a debatable question.

Mr. IGOE. I am very anxious to get the view of the gentleman on account of his experience in the newspaper business.

Mr. McCORMICK. I think that is a debatable question. With war 3,000 miles away, and since we may presume that public opinion and the natural patriotism of the average American will affect such a censorship as already exists, I think it is possible that further prohibition may be necessary. I am not ready to advance that view, because, having served in the profession of journalism, I have felt that in advancing it I might do so with unconscious bias, but I have been prepared to submit to the House a substitute for some of the language in section 4.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McCORMICK. May I have a few more minutes?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman

Mr. McCORMICK. I purpose later to offer for some of the language of the section a substitute based on the corresponding section of the Senate bill, a part of which I will read by way of illustration:

Any information with respect to the movement, numbers, description, or disposition of the armed forces, ships, aircraft, with respect to plans—

And so forth.

Mr. IGOE. Does that amendment provide that the President shall say what information with regard to those things will be prohibited, or does it simply specify in the law that nothing concerning those things shall be published?

Mr. McCORMICK. Under it the President may prohibit publication regarding a limited number of military and naval activities.

Mr. IGOE. Does not the Senate provision say "or any information regarding the national defense"?

Mr. McCORMICK. And that is precisely the part of the Senate proviso that I have not incorporated in the amendment which I have thought to offer.

Mr. IGOE. Now, when it comes to this it seems to me there is an agreement that there are things the publication of which should be prohibited and the power to say what those things are should be lodged in some one, although the Senate provision and the House amendment seem to agree upon that prohibition and that that power should be lodged in the President. Where is the difference between them?

Mr. McCORMICK. The distinction is that in one case the discretion is unlimited and in the other case it would be limited.

Mr. Speaker, candidly, I am far more fearful, and so are other Members of this House, that the administration of the War and Navy Departments will break down than that publication will be made of information hurtful to the military operations of the United States.

Mr. IGOE. It is a question of policy whether Congress wants to prohibit something or open the doors to everything. I was trying to get the views of the gentleman on those questions—whether you should prohibit them under any circumstances and in whom you would lodge the power.

Mr. McCORMICK. I would suggest that we must limit the scope of the prohibition or that we must create some other tribunal than the one provided for in the bill. If the gentleman has read articles on censorship published by officers of the War College, he will understand that while their views might be valuable under a people accustomed to such limitation of news, in this country they would be valueless. For example, they would prohibit criticism of the conduct of generals in the field.

Mr. IGOE. The most curious thing about it to me is that the papers do not seem to object very seriously to a law on the subject. That is another point.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, when the discussion on this bill was in progress Monday I believed that the general debate on this very important measure would continue until every Member who desired to speak on the subject had an opportunity to be heard. Ample time was given to all on the war resolution. No one was denied an opportunity to voice his views on the conscription bill. Yet Monday the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] expressed a desire late that afternoon to commence the reading of the bill and enter on the five-minute rule. This is not a question that can or should be discussed in five minutes. No Member of this House should be limited in his opposition to this un-American and vicious legislation. And surely such Members who favor it will require more than five minutes to justify their stand.

This bill is the most important measure that has come before the House during this and many previous sessions. It is a revolutionary measure. It shocks me as much as if a bill were proposed to change the color and formation of that flag we so dearly love. Gentlemen, if you do pass this bill and if it is enacted into law you change all that our flag ever stood and stands for, even though we do not change her colors.

We are at war. I realize it. The biggest task this country has ever undertaken. I know it. A fierce struggle awaits us. Still I have no fear. I doubt not the final victorious outcome of this conflict. I have confidence in the American people. This country will continue to exist after this war, and I want to do my part that it may exist a free and independent Nation, a Republic of republics, a model and inspiration to the oppressed people of the world.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. STEELE. Is there anything in this bill that limits the freedom of the people after the war?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No; not the bill in general, but some of the measures do. I will take that up in a minute.

Now, let us examine this bill. We all agree that a spy, whoever he may be, whether a citizen or an alien, who reveals military secrets to an enemy should be summarily and expeditiously disposed of. I hardly believe any legislation for such purpose is necessary. However, anything contained in this bill to cover any contingency not included in existing law or international usage, I agree, should be put on our statute books. So that there can be no objection to sections 1, 2, and 3 of Title I of this bill.

We come, then, to section 4, which the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina, the chairman of the committee, apologetically presented to us Monday. He admitted that it was an extreme measure; he candidly stated that the committee presents it with great reluctance; he expressed a willingness to accept any amendment which would satisfy the administration and carry out the desired intent. His presentation of the bill was clear and able but as half-hearted as that of any lawyer pleading a case in the merits and justice of which he does not conscientiously believe. The distinguished chairman justifies his stand on the already overworked handmaid of the Sixty-fifth Congress, "Support the President."

I for one do not believe that I can rubber stamp every whim of our various departments and properly do my duty to my country in accordance with the dictates of my conscience, the guidance of my intellect, however limited that may be, and in keeping with my oath of office. We all have our heart and soul in this war, but because we have our heart in it is no reason why we should lose our head. It is our patriotic duty to remain calm, cool, and deliberate. We have the responsibility of carrying this country through this war without impairing or limiting any of her institutions of true liberty or losing her entity as an ideal Republic. Yes; it is easy for a Member to rise on this floor as he would in the course of a local campaign, cheer the Stars and Stripes, proclaim his unqualified support to the administration, and obtain a ripple of applause to be parenthetically included in the RECORD for home consumption. Ours is a bigger task than that, and never in the history of this country had Congress such a struggle on its hands to maintain a free form of government as intended by the framers of the Declaration and the strict mandates of the Constitution.

The chairman tells us that the proviso at the end of section 4—let me read:

That nothing in this section shall be construed to limit or restrict any discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives or the publication of the same.

With this he tells you the press and the people of this country will be free to criticize and comment upon the policies of the Government. I asked him to reconcile, if he could, section 1202 on page 61 of the bill with the proviso. I asked him whether or not the one was a limitation on the other, and I was answered with the usual wave of the hand and the condescending "No" that a first-year man generally gets from a chairman of an important committee.

Let us see. Section 4 provides that after proclamation, and so forth, the President may prohibit the publication, communication, and so forth, of any information relating to the "national defense." Then the proviso limits the restriction to comments, discussions, or criticisms of the acts or polices of the Government. Section 1202 says:

The term "national defense" as used herein shall include any person, place, or thing in any wise having to do with the preparation for or the consideration or execution of any military or naval plans, expeditions, orders, supplies, or warfare for the advantage, defense, or security of the United States of America.

Section 4 refers to communications or publications relating to "national defense," so broadly defined in section 1202. With that in mind, can anyone conceive of the possibility of indulging in any discussion or comment or criticism, ostensibly permitted in the proviso without violating the provisions of section 4, thereby committing a crime and facing imprisonment for 10 years?

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. STEELE. Does the gentleman mean to say that that prohibits saying anything in relation to the national defense? Does not the section strictly say it is to be shown to the enemy and prohibited by the President?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes. The President must follow the words of section 4, and if he does that, you may be free to criticize; but you can not mention a person or a place or a thing. So what good does it do?

Mr. STEELE. Is the gentleman in favor of any restriction whatever on a publication that might be useful to the enemy?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No; not if it infringes on the rights guaranteed by Article I of the first amendment to the Constitution, and if it does more harm than good. The bill without section 4 is ample.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. I am very much interested in this section. Do you think there is anything in section 4 that will prohibit the papers from lambasting the War Department for inefficiency in letting contracts or inadequacy of food or anything that would not be helpful to the enemy at a strategic moment?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do; and I could so draw an indictment.

Mr. HOWARD. Under this act?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Under this act.

Mr. HOWARD. The gentleman has more imagination than I have if he can do it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. You will find if you pass this law that various United States district attorneys will have very resourceful imaginations.

Assuming the hypothetical case presented by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] of poor food being supplied to part of the military forces. That could not be criticized, for it would involve a disclosure of supplies within the meaning of the term "national defense." The term was broadened to purposely embrace every possible contingency and limit or suppress at will comment or criticism, no matter how remote. Imagine a comment or criticism without reference to place, person, or fact. The well-intended proviso of the committee might as well be omitted for all the good it will do. There can be no mistake about the intent and effect of this law. It is absolutely a limitation on the freedom of the press and speech. It is a flagrant and daring violation of the spirit of Article I of the first amendment to the Constitution.

The President realizes how extreme this measure. Let me read to you a letter from him to Mr. Arthur Brisbane, of the New York American:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, D. C., April 25, 1917.

ARTHUR BRISBANE,
New York Evening Journal, New York American,
New York City.

MY DEAR MR. BRISBANE: I sincerely appreciate the frankness of your interesting letter of April with reference to the so-called espionage bill now awaiting action by Congress.

I approve of this legislation, but I need not assure you and those interested in it that whatever action the Congress may decide upon, so far as I am personally concerned, I shall not expect or permit any part of this law to apply to me or any of my official acts or in any way to be used as a shield against criticism.

I can imagine no greater disservice to the country than to establish a system of censorship that would deny to the people of a free Republic like our own their indisputable right to criticize their own public officials. While exercising the great powers of the office I hold I would regret, in a crisis like the one through which we are now passing, to lose the benefit of patriotic and intelligent criticism.

In these trying times one can feel certain only of his motives, which he must strive to purge of selfishness of every kind, and wait with patience for the judgment of a calmer day to vindicate the wisdom of the course he has tried conscientiously to follow.

Thanking you for having written to me.

Cordially and sincerely, yours, WOODROW WILSON.

Has not the President provided every one of us who still cling to our constitutional form of representative government and to the liberties guaranteed by the Constitution a powerful argument with which to protest and vote against such a vicious and unconstitutional law?

The only possible construction that can be fairly put upon the President's words is that if this bill is made a law it will give him power to silence criticism and to muzzle the press. But he adds that he does not expect to use that power. I sincerely believe that at the time of the writing of the letter on April 25, 1917, he did not expect to use that power any more than in the months of September and October last he expected that he could "keep us out of war." The law admittedly makes the President a despot, but with the comforting assurance that the despot about to be created has the present expectation to be a very lenient, benevolent despot—the restrictions herein created to be enforced at the will of a sort of royal prerogative. The American people do not want tolerance; they demand the continuance of their constitutional rights.

Gentlemen, so much has been said about disclosing to the enemy, through the public press, the movements of our troops, manner, and strategy of our intended warfare. What is the matter with our War and Navy Departments? Can not they control this information? Are they going to cry from the roof of the department building their proposed plans? Do the gentlemen who have argued in favor of this bill not undervalue the ability, efficiency, honesty, and patriotism of our War and Navy Departments? Will the gentlemen not agree that the press of this country have an important, necessary, and distinctly patriotic mission to perform? Have we not experienced by past performances that a vigilant eye must be kept open in a crisis like this? Food, clothing, arms, ammunition, and medicine must be provided. The very best that money can buy is not too good for the boys of the American Army. The people of this country are united in their demands that the scandals, abuses, graft, and incompetency of 1898 are not to be repeated, and the press is their medium of detecting and exposing these abuses and crimes. It is our duty as their representatives to do nothing which will impair, restrict, or limit the press in the fulfillment of that duty. This alone, without considering the destruction of one of our basic fundamental principles of liberty, is sufficient justification to arouse the indignation of this House and send this bill back to the committee, where it should die in shame and neglect.

Some of the gentlemen have spoken about the protection of the American boy. We all want to protect him. It is for his protection that I oppose this bill. You have spoken about the vicious enemy. I know the enemy is vicious. We all know that, and prepare accordingly. When the American Army meets the enemy, whenever that may be, leave it to the American Army to crush him. But what more vicious, dangerous, and cowardly than the friendly domestic enemy who is willing to turn American blood into gold and sell rotten cornbeef, wormy beans, paper shoes, defective arms for our American boys? And when the American press ferrets him out they will likewise crush that enemy. Our Army and Navy shall not be the dumping place for all the defective arms and war supplies rejected by the allies during the past two years. On the second day of this session I introduced a bill providing death punishment for dishonest contractors. I hope the Committee on the Judiciary will report it out. I will tell you more on that subject when the time comes. I had better not get started on that now.

Do you know that American warehouses are bulging with defective arms and ammunition that has been rejected by the allies in the last two years? And are we going to make our Army and our Navy a dumping ground for these defective arms and this defective ammunition? We must keep our eyes open, so that they will not try to put it across.

Gentlemen, a very similar statute as the bill under consideration was enacted in 1798, entitled "An act in addition to the act entitled 'An act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States,' approved July 14, 1798, chapter 74."

Congress for that purpose passed an act punishing all unlawful combinations and conspiracies to oppose the measures of the Government, and, among other things, further provided for a public presentation and punishment by fine and imprisonment of all persons who should write, print, utter, or publish any false, scandalous, and malicious writing against the Government of the United States, or of either House of Congress, or of the President, with an intent to defame them, or bring them into contempt or disrepute, or to excite against them the hatred of the good people of the United States, or to excite them to oppose any law or act of the President in pursuance of law or his constitutional powers.

It became one of the most prominent points of attack upon the then administration. The appeal made to the people was more successful and more consonant with their feelings than any other made upon that occasion. Congress then, as now, was timid about it, and, as now, did not dare to make it a permanent statute, and we find in section 4 of the act that it "shall continue in force until the 3d day of March, 1801, and no longer," a period less than two years. The act being limited to a short period, expired by its own limitation and has never been renewed, until the present attempt in the year of our Lord, 1917. Justice Storey, in his work on the Constitution, referring to the act, says:

It has continued down to this very day to be a theme of reproach with many of those who have since succeeded to power.

Just one word more, if you will bear with me. Refer, please, to section 13 of section 509, page 46, of the bill. What does that mean? Why, simply to prevent the sending of money to further the cause of any of the oppressed people of Europe, striving for centuries to obtain their liberties. My time has about expired, but I sincerely hope that some of my colleagues will give this section the attention and discussion necessary to bring about its defeat. Gentlemen, we all agree that we do not want to send filibustering expeditions to any country with which we are at peace. We do not want to fit an army of adventure and send them from here fully equipped to "start something" elsewhere in the world. We do want, and insist, to reserve our rights to extend material and moral assistance to any oppressed people anywhere in the world, whether they live on a continent or on an island. Had this section been the law of our land in the past the Republic of Portugal would not have seen light; the hopes of the Russian people would not have been realized.

With the exception of the first three articles and some of the shipping provisions, this bill is dangerous and should not pass. The liberty of the press, guaranteed by the Constitution, has been so clearly defined, construed, and limited by the courts of this country for the past 130 years. It is so restricted to guard the rights of every citizen, and under the decisions the Government is not now in need of new and additional legislation to carry out any necessary or honest limitation. We must take a decisive stand now; otherwise we may have nothing to stand for.

This is true liberty, when free-born men,
Having to advise the public, may speak free,
Which he who can, and will, deserves high praise;
Who neither can, nor will, may hold his peace:
What can be juster in a State than this?

The great Milton quoted these lines from Euripides in his plea to the British Parliament for the freedom of the press. I hope no Milton in this House will remain "mute and inglorious." [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VENABLE].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Speaker, any man who does not recognize the fact that extraordinary occasions do away with ordinary rules, it seems to me, puts himself in the attitude of a man that I read of once, who refused to save another man from drowning because he had never been introduced to him and, hence, could take no liberties with his person. All normal rules are made in view of normal conditions, and extraordinary conditions necessarily remand a waiver of the ordinary rules of conduct, because the reason for a rule ends when the extraordinary circumstances arise.

There has been a great deal of discussion and criticism of section 4 of this act. I do not believe that any man desires the freedom of speech and of the press more than I. I believe that the preservation of the freedom of speech and of the press is absolutely essential to the preservation of the liberties of any people. But freedom of speech and freedom of the press never included protection for a speech or a publication which would do harm.

We have heard a great many statements that this section violates the Constitution; some claim in letter and others in spirit. I do not think that any man who knows anything about the subject would seriously contend that it violates the letter of the Constitution of the United States; neither do I believe that anyone on careful consideration would judge that it violated the spirit of the Constitution.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VENABLE. Yes.

Mr. SIEGEL. Will you tell me of any case in the United States Supreme Court that upholds your contention that this proposed section 4 is not a violation of the first amendment of the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. VENABLE. I know of none that either opposes it or upholds it. This particular section has never been construed, as I understand.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. VENABLE. Certainly.

Mr. ROSE. I would like to call the gentleman's attention to the provisions of section 4. It says—

Where the President may, by proclamation declare—

in his judgment is of such a character that it is or might be useful to the enemy.

If the President alone believes it to be useful to the enemy, I would like to know whether or not it is not an abridgment of the right of trial by jury. Has anybody anything to say, any jury anywhere, if the President himself believed it to be of value to the enemy? Is there any right given at all to an accused man to present his case to a jury if the President of the United States determines it to be of use to the enemy? Or does the gentleman himself believe that is in conformity with the law of this land?

Mr. VENABLE. I do not believe the right of trial by jury is involved, for the reason that the right of trial by jury includes the right of a trial according to the ordinary course of legal procedure, with a jury to determine whether the defendant has violated the statute or not. This section gives the President the power to prescribe that certain things shall not be published. In other words, the President defines the crime, and anyone who violates the statute would still have the right of trial by jury to determine whether his conduct was a violation or not. I will answer the gentleman's question a little further. As I understand it, the question involved in this is twofold. Is it just, and is it expedient? Does it violate any principle of right? If not, is it wise to adopt it?

We have heard a great deal said to the effect that this section violated the spirit of the Constitution, based, it seems to me, on some sort of an assumption that men have the right at all times and under all circumstances to say anything in the world they wish, provided what they say is the truth. Such is not the law, as I understand it. Such has never been the law, as I understand it, and I think what I am about to say will answer the gentleman who first asked me a question.

A newspaper and an individual occupy precisely and identically the same position before the law. A newspaper has no special sanctity or privilege attaching to it. A newspaper can not lawfully print or publish anything that an individual could not print or publish. The common law contains absolutely no exception in favor of newspapers. There is no special sanctity attaching to what a man says because of the fact that he prints it in a paper. Now, under the libel and slander laws, which have been in existence for hundreds of years, and operating, too, under the constitutional provision which said that Congress should not abridge the liberty of speech or of the press, a man could be indicted for criminal libel, and the truth of what he said was not of itself a sufficient defense. Of course, the plea of justification—that is, of truth—is a perfect defense as regards either slander or libel in a civil suit where an individual is seeking to obtain damages for injury, for the reason that only the private interest is there considered, and if a man be actually guilty of what he is charged with in the alleged libel or slander he has no standing before the law. But even though what a man says be true, if he prints it and commits a libel he is liable both under the common law and under the statutes of some States to indictment and punishment, fine or imprisonment, according to the terms of the statute within whose jurisdiction the crime was committed.

Mr. SIEGEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VENABLE. Not now. A little later. The reason of the rule, as I understand it, is this: In a criminal prosecution the State is not interested in the damage done to the individual, but even assuming that injury has been done, it takes the position, according to the axiom, that the greater the truth the greater the libel, the reason being that such publications are apt to cause the commission of breaches of the peace, and because it is against public interest that there should be breaches of the peace. Therefore the citizen is prohibited from publishing certain things, even though they be true, and no one has ever made the point against that provision of the law that it violated liberty of speech.

So we find the precedents clear and clean-cut, and the principle well recognized, that even though what is said be true, if it be contrary to the public interest to have it published, it shall not be published.

Mr. GORDON. There are constitutional provisions in nearly every State which provide that the truth may always be given in evidence, and that it shall be a defense if the publication was made with good motives and for justifiable ends.

Mr. VENABLE. Yes; that is true in some States.

Mr. GORDON. That is true, I think, in most States.

Mr. VENABLE. That is true in some States as against a criminal prosecution by the State.

Mr. GORDON. In any action, civil or criminal.

Mr. VENABLE. The truth has always been a justification in a civil suit without any constitutional provision; but the point I am making is that the law, notwithstanding the constitutional provision, recognizes the principle that if the public interest demands it, a man can be prohibited from publishing that which is true, and that there is no such thing as an inherent, inalienable right to say anything that a citizen wants to say, whether by word of mouth or in the newspapers, simply upon the ground that it is true and without regard to the public interest. No one has ever contended that that rule was unconstitutional, and no court has ever so held.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WEBB. I yield to the gentleman five minutes additional.

Mr. VENABLE. So we find that this provision does not violate any inherent right which a man has to publish what he pleases under the claim that it is true.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. VENABLE. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Suppose the President issues his proclamation, and I give information that his proclamation forbids; how am I to be convicted?

Mr. VENABLE. I presume you would be indicted and tried according to law.

Mr. CANNON. By a court?

Mr. VENABLE. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Entitled to a jury trial?

Mr. VENABLE. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Not to be tried by a court-martial?

Mr. VENABLE. No sir. As I understand it, this is a criminal statute like all the other criminal statutes of the United States.

Mr. CANNON. And I may deny everything that I choose to deny and may offer every defense that I choose to make?

Mr. VENABLE. And the burden of proof would be on the Government to prove you guilty.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely; and I would be entitled to a jury trial.

Mr. VENABLE. Absolutely; that is my understanding.

Mr. WEBB. Yes; the law will be executed by the civil authorities.

Mr. VENABLE. Absolutely; and the court would determine the law and instruct the jury.

The right of trial by jury, as I stated a while ago, is not in any way abridged by this section. So I submit to the House that no principle is violated.

Now, the question is, Is it expedient? Will any man contend that in times like these you do not have to have a censorship? Every Government at war has it. Every Government at war must have it. Now, the newspapers, or some of them, contend that they are so wise—and I do not doubt they have a great deal of wisdom—that they do not need any censorship; that their judgment, though the editors and managers are private citizens as the rest of us are, is so good that they can determine what to print and what not to print. Of course, we must have a censorship.

Now, that power must be vested somewhere. This Congress could not possibly pass enough regulations defining circumstances so as to cover the field, for the reason that no man knows in this war from day to day what is going to happen. This Congress will not be advised and can not be advised; this Congress is not in session all the time. This Congress can not now possibly define all the circumstances or kinds of data and information that must not be given out. So you must vest the power somewhere; and this bill chooses to vest it in the Chief Executive Officer of the Government, who is supposed to have all of the available information or at least has the means of advising himself as to developments and all the facts as they come into existence from time to time.

Now, some man objects and says that this large power ought not to be given to one man. You can not conduct wars except through dictators. I mean by that that wars can not be conducted successfully without the concentration of power somewhere. The Romans recognized that fact, and when they had a war they elected a man, or appointed a man, as dictator during the period of the war, because the actual conduct of war is purely an executive thing. You can not split up the responsibility, you can not split up the authority, so as to have a part of governmental executive power going in one direction and a part in another, without the plan failing from not being coordinated, so as to have oneness of action, oneness of purpose, and oneness of accomplishment.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VENABLE. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. I presume the gentleman uses the word "dictator" advisedly. But really the situation is such——

Mr. VENABLE. Oh, I do not mean that I would turn over everything to him, not a dictator in the strict sense of the word.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman has noticed some editorials as to what we ought to do in the matter of transportation and other things. I wondered if the gentleman would go that far.

Mr. VENABLE. No; I do not mean in the strict sense of the term. I mean this, that you have to necessarily concentrate authority in some one in order to get the best results. Of course, there are limits to that. I am not contending that the legislative department should turn over its functions altogether, or turn them over at all. I mean the principle of concentrating power must be observed. It is the wise course of legislation when circumstances demand it to concentrate executive power, because that is the only way to accomplish effective results.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VENABLE. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Would the gentleman concentrate power in the Executive by pulling down the power of Congress?

Mr. VENABLE. Oh, not at all. But I say Congress, in view of the war, as a matter of wise legislation, when it comes to things that pertain to executive matters, must vest the broadest powers and authority in the Executive. You can not conduct a war in any other way. There never was a war conducted in any other way; there never will be a war conducted in any other way; some man must pass upon these questions who is best able to do it, and that man is the head of the Government, I submit. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, the laws of war are not the laws of peace. Laws can be passed giving some sort of trial in time of war for offenses which otherwise would be punished without trial, and necessarily so. I read from a book which I knew as a boy—Whiting's War Powers Under the Constitution. It was published in 1862, and this edition in 1871, is the forty-third edition, yet people seem to have forgotten it. On page 163 he states that the President in a time of war is Commander in Chief and has supreme authority, under the Constitution, while governing and regulating the land and military forces.

Congress may refuse supplies or to raise troops; but for the military movements and measures essential to overcome the enemy, the President is responsible to and controlled by no other department of government. His duty is to uphold the Constitution and enforce the laws and to respect whatever rights loyal citizens are entitled to enjoy in time of civil war to the fullest extent that may be consistent with the performance of the military duty imposed on him.

What is the extent of the military power of the President over the persons and property of citizens at a distance from the seat of war—whether he or the War Department may lawfully order the arrest of citizens in loyal States on reasonable proof that they are either enemies or aiding the enemy; or that they are spies or emissaries of rebels sent to gain information for their use, or to discourage enlistments; whether martial law may be extended over such places as the commander deems it necessary to guard, even though distant from any battle field, in order to enable him to prosecute the war effectually; whether the writ of habeas corpus may be suspended, as to persons under military arrest, by the President, or only by Congress (on which point judges of the United States courts disagree); whether, in time of war, all citizens are liable to military arrest, on reasonable proof of their aiding or abetting the enemy, or whether they are entitled to practice treason until indicted by some grand jury (thus, for example, whether Jefferson Davis or Gen. Lee, if found in Boston, could be arrested by military authority and sent to Fort Warren); whether, in the midst of wide-spread and terrific war, those persons who violate the laws of war and the laws of peace, traitors, spies, emissaries, brigands, bushwackers, guerrillas, persons in the free States supplying arms and ammunition to the enemy, must all be proceeded against by civil tribunals only, under due forms and precedents of law, by the tardy and ineffectual machinery of arrests by marshals, who can rarely have means of apprehending them, and of grand juries, who meet twice a year, and could seldom, if ever, seasonably secure the evidence on which to indict them; whether government is not entitled by military power to prevent the traitors and spies, by arrest and imprisonment, from doing the intended mischief, as well as to punish them after it is done; whether war can be carried on successfully, without the power to save the Army and Navy from being betrayed and destroyed by depriving any citizen temporarily of the power of acting as an enemy, whenever there is reasonable cause to suspect him of being one. * * *

Whatever any commander in chief, in accordance with the usual practice of carrying on war among civilized nations, may order his army and navy to do, is within the power of the President to order and to execute, because the Constitution, in express terms, gives him the supreme command of both.

I shall not read the rest, though there is more here, and it is stated better than I can state it. Has the President the right to prevent what is dangerous by exercising arbitrary powers of imprisonment, of arrest, of seizure, wherever it seems to him a matter of danger? There were a few facts at that time. In 1861 the majority of the Legislature of the State of Maryland was disloyal. The State itself was loyal, but the majority of the Legislature of Maryland sympathized with the Southern States, and was about to pass a resolution to secede—a resolution which Mr. Lincoln regarded as against the Constitution. The President, without any warrant of law except his duty as the military commander to prevent insurrection, arrested members of the legislature and broke up their session. In 1861 certain papers in New York sympathized with the Confederate States and published editorials, and the grand jury presented them to the Postmaster General. After that presentment the Postmaster General denied the papers the privilege of the mails. Maj. Gen. Wallace, May 18, 1864, suppressed the Baltimore Evening Transcript. Gen. Rosecrans, May 26, 1864, prohibited circulation of the Metropolitan Record in the Department of Missouri. May 19, 1864—I get all this from that great book, McPherson's History of the United States, from November, 1860, to July 4, 1864, written by a clerk of this House and a former Member—when the New York World and Journal of Commerce published a forged proclamation asking for 400,000 more troops, Gen. Dix took possession of the newspaper offices and shut them up for four days. Gov. Seymour had him arrested. Gen. Dix submitted to arrest, but the case was never tried.

With reference to arrests, I need not go over the number of people who were in Fort Lafayette and in Fort Warren. Clement L. Vallandigham violated a proclamation forbidding people in the States of the North from exciting sympathy with the South, with which the North was at war, and was imprisoned until he escaped to Canada.

This course of action was not confined to the Northern States, either. The Southern States did just the same. In 1864, after arresting people in the same way, the Confederate Congress suspended the writ of habeas corpus, at the request of the president of the Confederacy, in all cases of treason and conspiracy to resist the lawful authority of the Confederate States or combining to assist the enemy, or of communicating intelligence, preparation, or attempts to incite servile insurrection, or desertions or encouraging desertions, or harboring deserters or spies and emissaries of the enemy, or holding correspondence or intercourse with the enemy without necessity, or unlawful trading, or destroying bridges, railroads, and so forth; and under that act the Government immediately established a military commission to try persons who were accused in these cases instead of sending them to a jury.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has eight minutes remaining.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I think that I can finish in the eight minutes, and then I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. I desire to know whether Lincoln did not suspend the writ of habeas corpus instead of Congress?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. We can not suspend the writ of habeas corpus. No one can suspend the writ of habeas corpus except in case of insurrection or invasion; but it was held by Attorney General Bates with reference to Lincoln, when Congress had never suspended the writ, that the military authorities acting in war were not subject to the writ, and that is the doctrine laid down by Whiting.

Mr. FESS. My friend will remember that Jefferson did suspend the writ of habeas corpus in 1807.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I know there is a question as to whether Congress or the President has the right to do it; but in this case it is held always that the Commander in Chief in time of war is not subject to the writ of habeas corpus as to what he does in his military capacity.

The question now is what to do. In this bill the first section says something about information to be communicated to an agent of the enemy; that is, material information. Must Government agents go before a United States commissioner or grand jury and show what that information is and that it is material, and thus disclose to the enemy what it is? Must the court grant bail to a man who is accused as a spy, so that he can run away or get his friends to run away? When you are dealing with a spy, must you try him in court and put all the evidence in that you do not want to have come out? When the accused is, we will say, proved to have accepted $300 for giving important papers to a particular person, must it also be proved that that particular person was an agent of the enemy? The act is well drawn, but you can not carry out any such act in time of war. The United States must have, as the Confederates did, military courts to dispose of such charges. In 1863 the United States made the same rule as to spies. (Act of Mar. 26, 1863, sec. 38.)

The United States as a free people always look, when they can, to the example of England. Admit there was a spy fever there. Admit that it seemed very terrible when I was there between September and November, 1915, to see in the papers nothing but this, "Another spy has been committed to the tower." A few days afterwards, "Another spy has been tried by Justices So-and-so, sitting as a military commission, and has been condemned to be executed, and has been executed." No other word whatever, but when we knew also that Zeppelins were dropping bombs and the physician who attended my family was patrolling the streets at night with a shotgun on his shoulder—there were no regular arms—in order to protect public buildings—when we now see also such things as occurred near Philadelphia where eighty-odd poor girls were lying dead and mutilated, some unrecognizable, because of the explosion of a munitions works, we have to confess that it is war, that it is really war, and that the authority of the Commander in Chief extends to every foot of territory of these United States in order to use his power even on mere suspicion to hold every man and to prevent every act, not to punish it—how are you going to punish a newspaper by a jury trial, whoever did it?—but to prevent every act by a newspaper or anyone else which will give information to the enemy.

I desire to direct the attention of the House to the authority of the English act, it is only a page long; I will only read a part of it, and with the permission of the House I will extend my remarks to print the whole of this act, and I therefore ask that permission.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Only to the extent of printing this act.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. In a moment. In 1914, on the 27th of November, the defense of the realm consolidation act was passed. It enacted:

His Majesty in council—

That would be the President here—

has power during the continuance of the present war to issue regulations for securing the public safety and the defense of the realm, * * * and may by such regulations authorize the trial by courts-martial, or in the case of minor offenses by courts of summary jurisdiction, and punishment of persons committing offenses against the regulations, and in particular against any of the provisions of such regulations designed—

(a) to prevent persons communicating with the enemy or obtaining information for that purpose or any purpose calculated to jeopardize the success of the operations of any of His Majesty's forces or the forces of his allies or to assist the enemy; or

(b) to secure the safety of His Majesty's forces and ships and the safety of any means of communication and of railways, ports, and harbors; or

(c) to prevent the spread of false reports or reports likely to cause disaffection to His Majesty, or to interfere with the success of His Majesty's forces by land or sea, or to prejudice His Majesty's relations with foreign powers; or

(d) to secure the navigation of vessels in accordance with directions given by or under the authority of the admiralty; or

(e) otherwise to prevent assistance being given to the enemy or the successful prosecution of the war being endangered.

The rest of it is for the establishment of courts-martial and summary courts for minor offenses. (Chitty's Annual Statutes, 1914, p. 27.) The question to be considered is whether it is better to leave the power simply to the discretion of the Executive from time to time to be exercised in his discretion, or to enact, as by the English law, that this power shall be exercised according to regulations that he shall publish. In England the revised regulations occupy some 30 pages in the following yearbook: Chitty, 1915, pages 936 to 964.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I will.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state how he would have all this regulated in time of peace?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Not at all, by law.

Mr. WALSH. Well, does not the gentleman recognize the fact that spies can do dangerous work in peace time?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Yes; and the bill is all right for peace, but the trouble about it is that it does not make provision for war.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has one minute remaining.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Let me say this one sentence first. The question is, gentlemen, Is it better in time of war to ask that the President shall regulate and give rules to his own action and to equalize his issuance of regulations and statements of what his action will be, whether by censor, or whatever it may be, to carry out these great national needs, or is it better to leave it as it was during the Civil War for unregulated discretionary action after the act had taken place, in closing up newspapers, and so forth?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman now yield for a question?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I will do so with great pleasure.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Did the gentleman read in the papers this morning the report of a very severe criticism made by a distinguished editor in Germany criticizing the German war administration? This bill would have prevented any such criticism in this country. Does the gentleman think we ought to be less liberal than they are in monarchial Germany?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I do not think that proper criticisms are at all against the regulations of this law of which I have been speaking. The English bill provides against communicating information and acts of every description. The question, as I have said before, is whether power shall be exercised by blind discretion or according to rule. [Applause.]

NOTE.—Regulation 18, Chitty, 1915, page 944, establishes the censoring of certain sorts of news carefully defined:

"18. No person shall, without lawful authority, collect, record, publish, or communicate, or attempt to elicit, any information with respect to the movement, numbers, description, condition, or disposition of any of the forces, ships, or aircraft of His Majesty or any of His Majesty's allies, or with respect to their plans or conduct or supposed plans or conduct, of any naval or military operations by any such forces, ships, or aircraft, or with respect to the supply, description, condition, transport, or manufacture or storage or place or intended place of manufacture or storage of war material, or with respect to any works or measures undertaken for or connected with or intended for the fortification or defense of any place, or any information of such a nature as is calculated to be or might be directly or indirectly useful to the enemy, and if any person contravenes the provisions of this regulation, or without lawful authority has in his possession any document containing any such information as aforesaid, he shall be guilty of an offense against these regulations.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON].

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, as time goes on the need for a joint committee on the conduct of the war, such as is proposed by the Weeks-Madden resolution, becomes more and more apparent. Surely, the administration should take Congress and the American people into its confidence as to true conditions, for the task which we have entered upon is far too great for any one man or a small number of men to bear alone. Congress has been most generous and loyal in its support of the various administration measures that have come up for consideration, and it deserves to be dealt with frankly rather than in an evasive manner. There is a great deal of objection over the entire land to the espionage bill.

I have here a list of 15 of the leading newspapers of this country, in every one of which have appeared editorials protesting against the passage of the espionage bill.

Mr. WEBB. May I interrupt my friend? Do not those newspaper articles refer to the bill as originally reported and not to the bill as we presented it to the House?

Mr. KNUTSON. Not according to my information. I took the list which the New York American published yesterday. There was a page editorial in that paper, and there were a great many papers listed in there as being opposed to the bill in its present form.

Mr. WEBB. I really think that the so-called spy bill that has been circulated was the one introduced in February and reintroduced in the extra session. I do not think it is the bill now before the House, concerning which I do not think the newspapers have full information. So I think the criticism is aimed at the old bill and not at this one.

Mr. KNUTSON. Not having seen the original editorials I am unable to state.

The espionage bill, in making the President the sole judge as to what constitutes writings and speech to be prohibited, clearly seeks to abrogate those provisions in the Federal Constitution which guarantees free speech and the freedom of the press.

I remember the great hue and cry that went up in the press of the land over the treatment the boys were receiving at Chickamauga and other training camps during the Spanish-American War, and the result of the publicity given to that scandal by the American press resulted in a complete change in the conduct of the Government toward our troops.

Take the Gallipoli campaign and the lack of shrapnel on the western front in the great European war; in the American papers from time to time have appeared editorials taken from the London Times and several other of the Northcliffe papers severely criticizing the conduct of the English campaign as carried on by Churchill, Asquith, and others, and I want to say there is not a ministry in office in Europe to-day that was in office at the outbreak of the war—and the European press is responsible for that fact—except I believe the German ministry is still in power. But in Germany they have a strict censorship over the press, and hence it has been possible for the German ministry to hold on longer than was the case in England, France, or Italy. Shall it be said that we, the greatest democracy in all the world, fear to go into this war with a free press and a free people behind us? Will Congress dare to assume before the people the position of favoring a measure that will stifle American liberties?

It is true that we are at war, and I heartily favor the provisions in this bill that will punish treasonable utterances and writings, but I greatly fear the provision in section 4 of the bill, which makes the President the court of last resort. I do not think that simply because we are at war it shall be necessary that Congress should abrogate its powers and turn them over to the President. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I hope to see section 4 so amended as to safeguard the freedom of the press and speech and at the same time protect the interests of the Republic.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman yields back four minutes.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I think everyone concedes there ought to be somewhere some power to control the publication of news during the present emergency. And I take it that if I have sensed the feelings of the Members of this House correctly in what conversations I have had with them, everyone seems to feel that there ought to be some limitation on the publication of facts during this war. And, while I think they believe that, there is another question that intrudes itself into my mind when I think about this, and that is the question of how far we can go in allowing some one to control the publication of facts that this people ought to know during the progress of this war.

I can see how the thing might be made an instrument of oppression, and it seems to me in my consideration of the bill as it is presented by the committee that it is too broad, and ought to be amended in some particulars. If I read section 4 correctly it gives to the President of the United States the right to use his judgment and to absolutely say what he thinks might or might not be useful to the enemy, and, irrespective of what it was, his judgment would be conclusive.

We have heard the right of trial by jury discussed or alluded to here by some of these gentlemen. It is true the right of trial by jury would exist, but the one thing that would be tried would be whether the man who was charged with the offense had violated some regulation that the President had made; whether, after the President had made up his mind that a certain thing might be useful to the enemy, the man could then discuss that proposition. And the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK] was right when he said that that would even extend to a private conversation on the street as well as to the publication in the newspapers.

I have always thought that it was highly inadvisable at any time for Congress or any other legislative body to deputize its lawmaking power to some other department of the Government. I remember an instance of that kind here a year or so ago, when this Congress passed an act permitting the Agricultural Department of this Government to make regulations relative to the protection of migratory birds. The Agricultural Department, in pursuance of that authority, passed certain rules and regulations, which have been changed from time to time, and which were not equitable and fair in their operation, in my experience, and regulations which have been largely disregarded by the people. In other words, I think it is not advisable at this time for the Congress or any other legislative body to try to deputize powers that ought to be exercised by it to some other department of the Government. It was not in that case and should not be in this case. I think Congress should, so far as it can, try to specify all the different classes of information which it does not desire to have given out, so that the President may by proclamation specify those particular classes so far as it is possible, and so that the people generally, gentlemen, may see written into the statutes of the country the law the violation of which will provide a penalty. But if this is passed in its present condition the President may make up his mind that a certain class of information which the people ought to have might be illegal and he can so proclaim, and the person then violating it will be subject to the penalty provided by this section. And it will be observed that the penalty provided in this section is somewhat drastic in its terms. It provides that anybody who violates the provisions of the act shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 10 years, or both. I believe some such amendment as the gentleman from Illinois has suggested should be adopted and that we ought to specify the kinds of information we think ought not to be given out. For instance, the movement of troops, the movement of ships, the number of troops, their disposition, what they are doing, and the classes of information that are manifestly on the face of things of value to the enemy if they are disclosed. But for us to say that the President may find a class of information to be useful to the enemy, such as was developed by the spoiled-beef matter in the Spanish War, such as Lord Northcliffe has called attention to in England on several occasions, such things as ought to be made public, I do not think that is a wise power to be given to anyone. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

ESPIONAGE.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, I am frank to say that I am unalterably and irrevocably opposed to section 4 of this bill, which would, according to my construction of its language, practically muzzle the press of the United States during the whole war period.

I have implicit faith in the loyalty and patriotism of the newspaper men of America that they will of their own accord prevent the publication of such information as would tend in any manner or in the slightest degree to aid the enemy.

If the editors and newspaper correspondents of the press of America are not to be trusted, who is to be trusted in this critical hour in the Nation's affairs?

The power of the press has always been wielded in behalf of the best interests of the Republic, and the man who is afraid of the rays of its publicity usually has something to conceal.

The proposed section of this bill, better known as the press-muzzler section, is unconstitutional beyond any doubt.

The first amendment to the Constitution of the United States reads as follows:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

I asked the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VENABLE] here to-day, when he was speaking, whether he had found any decision of the United States Supreme Court that had overridden that provision of the Constitution, and he answered promptly that he had not.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleamn yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SIEGEL. Yes.

Mr. STEELE. Is the gentleman acquainted with the suggestions made by the metropolitan press of New York?

Mr. SIEGEL. I am.

Mr. STEELE. Does the gentleman recollect this provision that they suggested should be put in the bill, that when a state of war exists the President shall prohibit the use of the mails, the telegraph, the telephone, and cables and all means of transmission of information to any foreign country—information that may be of injury to the United States, and that he shall be empowered to issue such regulations as will render his prohibition effective?

Mr. SIEGEL. I am familiar with that, but that is not what they or other people say as to the question of the constitutionality of the act. I want to say also that there were Members of this House who opposed the judgment of gentlemen who favored the finding of contempt against H. Snowden Marshall, United States district attorney for the southern district of New York, and who felt that they had the right to punish him for contempt. The gentleman from Pennsylvania and others upheld our position, and the Supreme Court of the United States took our view of the situation; so that it is not always the legal opinion of people who are older in years or in experience than others that controls or affects the opinion of the Supreme Court in regard to any laws that Congress has enacted or desires to enact. We have to learn every day in the year until the final summons comes.

It is wise at this time to recall the words of Mr. James M. Beck, who was later Assistant Attorney General of the United States, and who in The Lewis Publishing Co. v. Morgan (229 U. S., 288. pp. 292, 293), said:

> The first amendment means, in substance, that no burden or restriction should be imposed upon the press, excepting only in matters of recognized morality and subject always to responsibility at common law for libelous statements. The history which preceded the first amendment clearly shows that it was made to prevent a censorship of the press either by anticipation through a licensing system or retrospectively by obstruction or punishment.
> To concede to Congress the power * * * to discipline the free press of the country would hereafter mean a stricter and more dangerous censorship, for in the matter of arbitrary power "the appetite grows by what it feeds on."

Thomas Jefferson, in 1799, said:

> I am for freedom of the press, and against all violations of the Constitution to silence by force and not by reason the complaints or criticisms, just or unjust, of our citizens against the conduct of their agents.

And in 1816 he said:

> Where the press is free and every man able to read all is safe.

And let me say to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE] that in an article which appeared in the Saturday Evening Post of February 12, 1910, ex-Gov. Joseph W. Folk said:

> We are too apt to accept such reforms as trial by jury, freedom of speech, and freedom of religion as matters of course, forgetting the struggle of centuries that brought these things about. It is much easier to lose these blessings than for us to gain them. The evils arising from the abuses of freedom of speech, the stage, and the press are bad enough, to be sure, but not so bad as tyranny. The power of censorship may be abused as well as freedom, and when that is abused there is tyranny. An aroused public conscience and an educated public opinion must correct these evils. There is little danger from error when public opinion is enlightened and reason is free. * * * The right of free speech does not mean only the right to say pleasant things, but the right to say things displeasing to the powers that be

One of the gentlemen of the committee said to me, "Why, we can prosecute, if this law is enacted, in any particular section of the country." In other words, if a newspaper published in New York prints some article highly displeasing to some one in power an indictment could be found, say, in St. Louis, and a newspaper editor might be dragged from New York to St. Louis. I do not like to differ with men older than myself or more mature in knowledge and of longer service in the House than I, but let me say that that question was determined long ago, away back in 1897 or 1898, when an indictment was found in the District of Columbia against Charles A. Dana, then editor of the New York Sun; that indictment was found at the request of Mr. Noyes, he being the complaining witness at that time. Mr. Elihu Root appeared in behalf of Mr. Dana, and the court held at that time that you could not go and indict a man in any part of the country where a newspaper might circulate, but the indictment must be found in the particular locality where the newspaper is published. I have only to refer to the later case of the United States against The Press Publishing Co., in Two hundred and nineteenth United States, page 1, where an indictment was found against the Press Publishing Co.—the New York World. I read from page 15:

> In view of the unity between the act of composing and the primary publication of a newspaper containing a libelous article within the State of New York, and of subsequent publications or repetitions thereof by the publisher of the newspaper which are clearly the resultant of the provisions of the laws of New York above quoted and referred to, two propositions are, we think, plainly established: First, that adequate means were afforded for punishing the circulation of the libel on a United States reservation by the State law and in the State courts without the necessity of resorting to the courts of the United States for redress; second, that resort could not be had to the courts of the United States to punish the act of publishing a newspaper libel by circulating a copy of the newspaper on the reservation upon the theory that such publication was an independent offense, separate and distinct from the primary printing and publishing of the libelous article within the State of New York, without disregarding the laws of that State and frustrating the plain purpose of such law, which was that there should be but a single prosecution and conviction.

It was contended that you could proceed and take the editor of a newspaper where the publication takes place and take him to another part of the country. The judges of the court held the contrary. I could also call attention, if I would, to the recent case of one Thomas Watson, in the State of Georgia, where, as we all know, he has been indicted several times, and he can never be convicted. The Attorney General had an idea that he could take Mr. Watson from the State of Georgia to some other State where a fair trial, according to the Attorney General, could be had. Several gentlemen here of the State of Georgia asked me what I thought of the proposition.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIEGEL. Yes.

Mr. DILLON. Would not that depend on the statute fixing the place where the trial is to be had?

Mr. SIEGEL. Oh, no. The Supreme Court has settled that decisively and specifically in this New York World case, and in the case against the Indianapolis News a similar decision was rendered by United States District Judge Anderson. You can not drag a man from one part of the country and try him in another part of the country.

Mr. DILLON. But suppose the statute does give you the power to do that?

Mr. SIEGEL. Then the statute is unconstitutional.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SIEGEL. I would like to have two or three minutes more, if the gentleman can spare it.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield three minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, this is one of the most important bills before Congress. I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will count.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio withdraws the point of no quorum. The gentleman from New York is recognized for three minutes more.

Mr. SIEGEL. In answer to the question, Mr. Speaker, I will state that Congress passed an act on July 7, 1898, the effect of which was to incorporate the criminal laws of the several States in force in July, 1898, into a statute and to make such criminal laws the laws of the United States. The text is quite large, and it is all found in this decision of the United States against the Press Publishing Co., supra.

Mr. Speaker, that the power which is sought to be given by this bill might in some cases be wrongly exercised can readily be seen from the letter which the President wrote to Mr. Arthur Brisbane, and wherein he said in part:

> I shall not expect or permit any part of this law to apply to me or any of my official acts, or in any way to be used as a shield against criticism. * * * While exercising the great powers of the office I hold I should regret in a crisis like the one through which we are now passing to lose the benefit of patriotic and intelligent criticism.

I can not bring myself to vote for a measure which is clearly unconstitutional and opposed to the best interests of the Nation.

There is no demand on the part of the people of the United States for the enactment of an unconstitutional law which is going to prevent the exposure of any scandal that may arise in the present conflict or which will prevent the public from knowing whether the men who are going to fight the Nation's battles are receiving the proper kind of food and treatment which they are entitled to have.

We must realize that the press of the United States has always responded to the requests that the President of the United States has made to its representatives to keep from the public such information as the military and naval authorities deemed it inadvisable to disclose to the people at large. I have made a search of all the decisions handed down by the United States Supreme Court and I can find no information anywhere that the court has reached the point where it is going to override the first amendment to the Constitution. A reading of the opinion in the case against District Attorney Snowden H. Marshall would more than confirm the belief that the court believes in free speech and that public officials are subject to criticism of all kinds. The opinion of the court in full is as follows:

[Supreme Court of the United States. No. 606, October term, 1916. H. Snowden Marshall, appellant, v. Robert B. Gordon, Sergeant at Arms of the House of Representatives of the United States. Appeal from the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.]

(Apr. 23, 1917.)

Mr. Chief Justice White delivered the opinion of the court.

These are the facts: A Member of the House of Representatives on the floor charged the appellant, who was the district attorney of the southern district of New York, with many acts of misfeasance and nonfeasance. When this was done the grand jury in the southern district of New York was engaged in investigating alleged illegal conduct of the Member in relation to the Sherman antitrust law and asserted illegal activities of an organization known as Labor's National Peace Council, to which the Member belonged. The investigation as to the latter subject not having been yet reported upon by the grand jury, that body found an indictment against the Member for a violation of the Sherman law. Subsequently calling attention to his previous charges and stating others, the Member requested that the Judiciary Committee be directed to inquire and report concerning the charges against the appellant in so far as they constituted impeachable offenses. After the adoption of this resolution a subcommittee was appointed, which proceeded to New York to take testimony. Friction there arose between the subcommittee and the office of the district attorney, based upon the assertion that the subcommittee was seeking to unlawfully penetrate the proceedings of the grand jury relating to the indictment and the investigations in question. In a daily newspaper an article appeared charging that the writer was informed that the subcommittee was endeavoring rather to investigate and frustrate the action of the grand jury than to investigate the conduct of the district attorney. When called upon by the subcommittee to disclose the name of his informant the writer declined to do so, and proceedings for contempt of the House were threatened. The district attorney thereupon addressed a letter to the chairman of the subcommittee, avowing that he was the informant referred to in the article, averring that the charges were true, and repeating them in amplified form in language which was certainly unparliamentary and manifestly ill tempered and which was well calculated to arouse the indignation not only of the members of the subcommittee but of those of the House generally. This letter was given to the press, so that it might be published contemporaneously with its receipt by the chairman of the subcommittee. The Judiciary Committee reported the matter to the House, and a select committee was appointed to consider the subject. The district attorney was called before that committee and reasserted the charges made in the letter, averring that they were justified by the circumstances and stating that they would, under the same conditions, be made again. Thereupon the select committee made a report and stated its conclusions and recommendations to the House as follows:

"We conclude and find that the aforesaid letter, written and published by said H. Snowden Marshall to Hon. C. C. CARLIN, chairman of the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives, on March 4, 1916, * * * is as a whole and in several of the separate sentences defamatory and insulting and tends to bring the House into public contempt and ridicule, and that the said H. Snowden Marshall, by writing and publishing the same, is guilty of contempt of the House of Representatives of the United States because of the violation of its privileges, its honor, and its dignity."

Upon the adoption of this report, under the authority of the House, a formal warrant for arrest was issued, and its execution by the Sergeant at Arms in New York was followed by an application for discharge on habeas corpus, and the correctness of the judgment of the court below refusing the same is the matter before us on this direct appeal.

Whether the House had power under the Constitution to deal with the conduct of the district attorney in writing the letter as a contempt of its authority and to inflict punishment upon the writer for such contempt as a matter of legislative power—that is, without subjecting him to the statutory modes of trial provided for criminal offenses protected by the limitations and safeguards which the Constitution imposes as to such subject, is the question which is before us. There is unity between the parties only in one respect—that is, that the existence of constitutional power is the sole matter to be decided. As to all else there is entire discord, every premise of law or authority relied upon by the one side being challenged in some respects by the other. We consider, therefore, that the shortest way to meet and dispose of the issue is to treat the subject as one of first impression, and we proceed to do so.

Undoubtedly what went before the adoption of the Constitution may be resorted to for the purpose of throwing light on its provisions. Certain is it that authority was possessed by the House of Commons in England to punish for contempt directly—that is, without the intervention of courts—and that such power included a variety of acts and many forms of punishment including the right to fix a prolonged term of imprisonment. Indubitable also is it, however, that this power rested upon an assumed blending of legislative and judicial authority possessed by the Parliament when the Lords and Commons were one, and continued to operate after the division of Parliament into two houses either because the interblended power was thought to continue to reside in the Commons, or by the force of routine the mere reminiscence of the commingled powers led to a continued exercise of the wide authority as to contempt formerly existing long after the foundation of judicial-legislative power upon which it rested had ceased to exist. That this exercise of the right of legislative-judicial power to exert the authority stated prevailed in England at the time of the adoption of the Constitution and for some time after has been so often recognized by the decided cases relied upon and by decisions of this court, some of which are in the margin (Brass Crosby's Case, 3 Wils. 188; Burdett v. Abbott, 14 East., 1; Stockdale v. Hansard, 9 Ad. & El., 1; Anderson v. Dunn, 6 Wheat., 204; Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 U. S., 168), as to make it too certain for anything but statement.

Clear also is it, however, that in the State governments prior to the formation of the Constitution the incompatibility of the intermixture of the legislative and judicial power was recognized and the duty of separating the two was felt, as was manifested by provisions contained in some of the State constitutions enacted prior to the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, as illustrated by the following articles in the constitutions of Maryland and Massachusetts:

"That the house of delegates may punish, by imprisonment, any persons who shall be guilty of a contempt in their view, by any disorderly or riotous behavior, or by threats to, or abuse of, their members, or by any obstruction to their proceedings. They may also punish, by imprisonment, any person who shall be guilty of a breach of privilege, by arresting on civil process, or by assaulting any of their members, during their sitting, or on their way to, or return from, the house of delegates, or by any assault of, or obstruction to, their officers, in the execution of any order or process, or by assaulting or obstructing any witness, or any other person, attending on, or their way to or from the house, or by rescuing any person committed by the house; and the senate may exercise the same power, in similar cases." (Constitution of Maryland, 1776, art. 12.)

"They [the house of representatives] shall have authority to punish by imprisonment every person, not a member, who shall be guilty of disrespect to the house, by any disorderly or contemptuous behavior in its presence; or who, in the town where the general court is sitting, and during the time of its sitting, shall threaten harm to the body or estate of any of its members, for anything said or done in the house; or who shall assault any of them therefor; or who shall assault or arrest any witness, or other person, ordered to attend the house, in his way in going or returning; or who shall rescue any person arrested by the order of the house.

"And no member of the house of representatives shall be arrested, or held to bail on mesne process, during his going unto, returning from, or his attending the general assembly.

"The senate shall have the same powers in the like cases; and the governor and council shall have the same authority to punish in like cases: Provided, That no imprisonment, on the warrant or order of the governor, council, senate, or house of representatives, for either of the above-described offenses, be for a term exceeding 30 days." (Constitution of Massachusetts, 1780, pt. 2, chap. 1, sec. 3, arts. 10 and 11.)

The similarity of the provisions points to the identity of the evil which they were intended to reach. Clearly they operate to destroy the admixture of judicial and legislative power as prevailing in the House of Commons, since the provisions in both the State constitutions and the limitations accompanying them are wholly incompatible with judicial authority. Moreover, as under State constitutions all governmental power not denied is possessed, the provisions were clearly not intended to give legislative power as such, for full legislative power to deal with the enumerated acts as criminal offenses and provide for their punishment accordingly already obtained. The object, therefore, of the provisions could only have been to recognize the right of the legislative power to deal with the particular acts without reference to their violation of the criminal law and their susceptibility of being punished under that law because of the necessity of such a legislative authority to prevent or punish the acts independently because of the destruction of legislative power which would arise from such acts if such authority was not possessed.

How dominant these views were can be measured by the fact that in various other States almost contemporaneously with the adoption of the Constitution similar provisions were written into their constitutions and continued to be adopted until it is true to say that they became, if not universal, certainly largely predominant in the States. (1790, South Carolina, art. 1, sec. 13; 1792, New Hampshire, pt. 2, secs. 22 and 23; 1796, Tennessee, art. 1, sec. 11; 1798, Georgia, art. 1, sec. 13; 1802, Ohio, art. 1, sec. 14; 1816, Indiana, art. 3, sec. 14; 1817, Mississippi, art. 3, sec. 20; 1818, Illinois, art. 2, sec. 13; 1820, Maine, art. 4, pt. 3, sec. 6; 1820, Missouri, art. 3, sec. 19.)

No power was expressly conferred by the Constitution of the United States on the subject except that given to the House to deal with contempt committed by its own Members. Article 1, section 5. As the rule concerning the Constitution of the United States is that powers not delegated were reserved to the people or the States, it follows that no other express authority to deal with contempt can be conceived of. It comes, then, to this: Was such an authority implied from the powers granted? As it is unthinkable that in any case from a power expressly granted there can be implied the authority to destroy the grant made, and as the possession by Congress of the commingled legislative-judicial authority as to contempts which was exerted in the House of Commons would be absolutely destructive of the distinction between legislative, executive, and judicial authority which is interwoven in the very fabric of the Constitution and would disregard express limitations therein, it must follow that there is no ground whatever for assuming that any implication as to such a power may be deduced from any grant of authority made to Congress by the Constitution. This conclusion has long since been authoritatively settled and is not open to be disputed. Anderson v. Dunn, 6 Wheaton, 204; Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 United States, 168. Whether the right to deal with contempt in the limited way provided in the State constitutions may be implied in Congress as the result of the legislative power granted, must depend upon how far such limited power is ancillary or incidental to the power granted to Congress—a subject which we shall hereafter approach.

The rule of constitutional interpretation announced in McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheaton, 316, that that which was reasonably appropriate and relevant to the exercise of a granted power was to be considered as accompanying the grant, has been so universally applied that it suffices merely to state it. And as there is nothing in the inherent nature of the power to deal with contempt which causes it to be an exception to such rule, there can be no reason for refusing to apply it to that subject.

Thus in Anderson v. Dunn, supra, which was an action for false imprisonment against the Sergeant at Arms of the House for having executed a warrant for arrest issued by that body in a contempt proceeding, after holding, as we have already said, that the power possessed by the House of Commons was incompatible with the Constitution and could not be exerted by the House, it was yet explicitly decided that from the power to legislate given by the Constitution to Congress there was to be implied the right of Congress to preserve itself; that is, to deal by way of contempt with direct obstructions to its legislative duties. In Kilbourn v. Thompson, supra, which was also a case of false imprisonment for arrest under a warrant issued by order of the House in a contempt proceeding, although the want of right of the House of Representatives to exert the judicial-legislative power possessed by the House of Commons was expressly reiterated, the question was reserved as to the right to imply an authority in the House of Representatives to deal with contempt as to a subject matter within its jurisdiction, the particular case having been decided on the ground that the subject with which the contempt proceedings were concerned was totally beyond the jurisdiction of the House to investigate. But in In re Chapman, 166 United States, 661, the principle of the existence of an implied legislative authority under certain conditions to deal with contempt was again considered and upheld. The case was this: Chapman had refused to testify in a Senate proceeding and was indicted under section 102 of the Revised Statutes, making such refusal criminal. He sued out a habeas corpus on the ground that the subject of the refusal was exclusively cognizable by the Senate and that therefore the statute was unconstitutional as a wrongful delegation by the Senate of its authority and because to subject him to prosecution under the statute might submit him to double jeopardy; that is, leave him after punishment under the statute to be dealt with by the Senate as for contempt. After demonstrating the want of merit in the argument as to delegation of authority, the proposition was held to be unsound and the contention as to double jeopardy was also adversely disposed of on the ground of the distinction between the implied right to punish for contempt and the authority to provide by statute for punishment for wrongful acts and to prosecute under the same for a failure to testify, the court saying that "the two being diverso intuito and capable of standing together," they were susceptible of being separately exercised.

acts the prevention of which is necessary to preserve legislative authority, by the decision of the privy council in Kielley v. Carson, 4 Moo. P. C., 63, which was fully stated in Kilbourn v. Thompson, supra, but which we again state. The case was this: Kielley was adjudged by the House of Assembly of Newfoundland, guilty of contempt for having reproached a member "in coarse and threatening language" for words spoken in debate in the house. A warrant was issued and Kielley was arrested. When brought before the house he refused to apologize and indulged in further violent language toward the member and was committed. Having been discharged on habeas corpus proceedings, he brought an action for false imprisonment against the speaker and other members of the House. As a justification the defendants pleaded that they had acted under the authority of the house. A demurrer to the plea was overruled and there was a judgment for the defendants. The appeal was twice heard by the privy council, the court on the second argument having been composed of the Lord Chancellor (Lyndhurst), Lords Brougham, Denman, Abinger, Cottenham, and Campbell, the vice chancellor (Shadwell), the lord chief justice of the common pleas (Tindal), Mr. Justice Erskine, Lushington, and Baron Parke.

The opinion on reversal was written by Parke, B., who said:

"The main question raised by the pleadings, * * * was whether the house of assembly had the power to arrest and bring before them, with a view to punishment, a person charged by one of its members with having used insolent language to him out of the doors of the house, in reference to his conduct as a member of the assembly—in other words, whether the house had the power, such as is possessed by both Houses of Parliament in England, to adjudicate upon a complaint of contempt or breach of privilege."

After pointing out that the power was not expressly granted to the local legislature by the crown, it was said the question was "whether by law, the power of committing for a contempt, not in the presence of the assembly, is incident to every local legislature."

"The statute law on this subject being silent, the common law is to govern it; and what is the common law, depends upon principle and precedent.

"Their lordships see no reason to think that in the principle of the common law any other powers are given them than such as are necessary to the existence of such a body and the proper exercise of the functions which it is intended to execute. These powers are granted by the very act of its establishment, an act which on both sides it is admitted it was competent for the crown to perform. This is the principle which governs all legal incidents." And after quoting the aphorism of the Roman law to the effect that the conferring of a given power carries with it by implication the right to do those things which were necessary to the carrying out of the power given, the opinion proceeded: "In conformity to this principle we feel no doubt that And light is thrown upon the right to imply legislative power to deal directly by way of contempt without criminal prosecution with such an assembly has the right of protecting itself from all impediments to the due course of its proceeding. To the full extent of every measure which it may be really necessary to adopt, to secure the free exercise of their legislative functions, they are justified in acting by the principle of the common law. But the power of punishing any one for past misconduct as a contempt of its authority, and adjudication upon the fact of such contempt, and the measure of punishment as a judicial body, irresponsible to the party accused, whatever the real facts may be, is of a very different character, and by no means essentially necessary for the exercise of its functions by a local legislature, whether representative or not. All these functions may be well performed without this extraordinary power, and with the aid of the ordinary tribunals to investigate and punish contemptuous insults and interruptions."

There can be no doubt that the ruling in the case just stated upheld the existence of the implied power to punish for contempt as distinct from legislative authority and yet flowing from it. It thus becomes apparent that from a doctrinal point of view the English rule concerning legislative bodies generally came to be in exact accord with that which was recognized in Anderson v. Dunn, supra, as belonging to congress; that is, that in virtue of the grant of legislative authority there would be a power implied to deal with contempt in so far as that authority was necessary to preserve and carry out the legislative authority given. While the doctrine of Kielley v. Carson was thus in substantive principle the same as that announced in Anderson v. Dunn, we must not be understood as accepting the application which was made of the rule to the particular case there in question since, as we shall hereafter have occasion to show, we think that the application was not consistent with the rule which the case announced and would, if applied, unwarrantedly limit the implied power of Congress to deal with contempt.

What does this implied power embrace, is thus the question. In answering, it must be borne in mind that the power rests simply upon the implication that the right has been given to do that which is essential to the execution of some other and substantive authority expressly conferred. The power is therefore but a force implied to bring into existence the conditions to which constitutional limitations apply. It is a means to an end and not the end itself. Hence it rests solely upon the right of self-preservation to enable the public powers given to be exerted.

These principles are plainly the result of what was decided in Anderson v. Dunn, supra, since in that case in answering the question what was the rule by which the extent of the implied power of legislative assemblies to deal with contempt was controlled it was declared to be "the least possible power adequate to the end proposed" (6 Wheat., 231), which was but a form of stating that as it resulted from implication and not from legislative will the legislative will was powerless to extend it further than implication would justify. The concrete application of the definition and the principle upon which it rests were aptly illustrated in In re Chapman, supra, where, because of the distinction existing between the two which was drawn, the implied power was decided not to come under the operation of a constitutional limitation applicable to a case resting upon the exercise of substantive legislative power.

Without undertaking to inclusively mention the subjects embraced in the implied power, we think from the very nature of that power it is clear that it does not embrace punishment for contempt as punishment, since it rests only upon the right of self-preservation; that is, the right to prevent acts which in and of themselves inherently obstruct or prevent the discharge of legislative duty or the refusal to do that which there is an inherent legislative power to compel in order that legislative functions may be performed. And the essential nature of the power also makes clear the cogency and application of the two limitations which were expressly pointed out in Anderson v. Dunn, supra; that is, that the power, even when applied to subjects which justified its exercise, is limited to imprisonment, and such imprisonment may not be extended beyond the session of the body in which the contempt occurred. Not only the adjudged cases but the congressional action in enacting legislation as well as in exerting the implied power conclusively sustain the views just stated. Take, for instance, the statute referred to in In re Chapman, where, not at all interfering with the implied congressional power to deal with the refusal to give testimony in a matter where there was a right to exact it, the substantive power had been exerted to make such refusal a crime, the two being distinct the one from the other. So also when the difference between the judicial and legislative powers are considered and the divergent elements, which in the nature of things enter into the determination of what is self-preservation in the two cases, the same result is established by the statutory provisions dealing with the judicial authority to summarily punish for contempt; that is, without resorting to the modes of trial required by constitutional limitations or otherwise for substantive offenses under the criminal law. (Act of Mar. 2, 1831, 4 Stat., 487.) The legislative history of the exertion of the implied power to deal with contempt by the Senate or House of Representatives when viewed comprehensively from the beginning points to the distinction upon which the power rests and sustains the limitations inhering in it which we have stated. The principal instances are mentioned in the margin (1795, attempt to bribe Members of the House; 1800, publication of criticism of the Senate; 1809, assault on a Member of the House; 1818, attempt to bribe a Member of the House; 1828, assault on the Secretary to the President in the Capitol; 1832, assault on a Member of the House; 1835, assault on a Member of the House; 1842, contumacious witness; 1857, contumacious witness; 1858, contumacious witness; 1859, contumacious witness; 1865, assault on a Member of the House; 1866, assault on a clerk of a committee of the House; 1870, assault on a Member of the House; 1871, contumacious witness; 1874, contumacious witness; 1876, contumacious witness; 1894, contumacious witness; 1913, assault on a Member of the House), and they all, except two or three, deal with either physical obstruction of the legislative body in the discharge of its duties or physical assault upon its Members for action taken or words spoken in the body, or obstruction of its officers in the performance of their official duties, or the prevention of Members from attending so that their duties might be performed, or, finally, with contumacy in refusing to obey orders to produce documents or give testimony which there was a right to compel.

In the two or three instances not embraced in the classes we think it plainly appears that for the moment the distinction was overlooked which existed between the legislative power to make criminal every form of act which can constitute a contempt to be punished according to the orderly process of law and the accessory implied power to deal with particular acts as contempts outside of the ordinary process of law because of the effect such particular acts may have in preventing the exercise of legislative authority. And in the debates which ensued when the various cases were under consideration it would seem that the difference between the legislative and the judicial power was also sometimes forgotten, that is to say, the legislative right to exercise discretion was confounded with the want of judicial power to interfere with the legislative discretion when lawfully exerted. But these considerations are accidental and do not change the concrete result manifested by considering the subject from the beginning. Thus we have been able to discover no single instance where in the exertion of the power to compel testimony restraint was ever made to extend beyond the time when the witness should signify his willingness to testify, the penalty or punishment for the refusal remaining controlled by the general criminal law. So again we have been able to discover no instance, except the two or three above referred to, where acts of physical interference were treated as within the implied power unless they possessed the obstructive or preventive characteristics which we have stated, or any case where any restraint was imposed after it became manifest that there was no room for a legislative judgment as to the virtual continuance of the wrongful interference which was the subject of consideration. And this latter statement causes us to say, referring to Kielley v. Carson, supra, that where a particular act because of interference with the right of self-preservation comes within the jurisdiction of the House to deal with directly under its implied power to preserve its functions and therefore without resort to judicial proceedings under the general criminal law, we are of opinion that authority does not cease to exist because the act complained of had been committed when the authority was exerted, for to so hold would be to admit the authority and at the same time to deny it. On the contrary when an act is of such a character as to subject it to be dealt with as a contempt under the implied authority, we are of opinion that jurisdiction is acquired by Congress to act on the subject and therefore there necessarily results from this power the right to determine in the use of legitimate and fair discretion how far from the nature and character of the act there is necessity for repression to prevent immediate recurrence, that is to say, the continued existence of the interference or obstruction to the exercise of the legislative power. And of course in such case as in every other, unless there be manifest an absolute disregard of discretion and a mere exertion of arbitrary power coming within the reach of constitutional limitations, the exercise of the authority is not subject to judicial interference.

It remains only to consider whether the acts which were dealt with in the case in hand were of such a character as to bring them within the implied power to deal with contempt; that is, the accessory power possessed to prevent the right to exert the powers given from being obstructed and virtually destroyed. That they were not, would seem to be demonstrated by the fact that the contentions relied upon in the elaborate arguments at bar to sustain the authority were principally rested not upon such assumption, but upon the application and controlling force of the rule governing in the House of Commons. But aside from this, coming to test the question by a consideration of the conclusion upon which the contempt proceedings were based as expressed in the report of the select committee which we have previously quoted and the action of the House of Representatives based on it, there is room only for the conclusion that the contempt was deemed to result from the writing of the letter not because of any obstruction to the performance of legislative duty resulting from the letter or because the preservation of the power of the house to carry out its legislative authority was endangered by its writing, but because of the effect and operation which the irritating and ill-tempered statements made in the letter would produce upon the public mind or because of the sense of indignation which it may be assumed was produced by the letter upon the members of the committee and of the House generally. But to state this situation is to demonstrate that the contempt relied upon was not intrinsic to the right of the House to preserve the means of discharging its legislative duties, but was extrinsic to the discharge of such duties and related only to the presumed operation which the letter might have upon the public mind and the indignation naturally felt by members of the committee on the subject. But these considerations plainly serve to mark the broad boundary line which separates the limited implied power to deal with classes of acts as contempts for self-preservation and the comprehensive legislative power to provide by law for punishment for wrongful acts.

The conclusions which we have stated bring about a concordant operation of all the powers of the legislative and judicial departments of the Government, express or implied, as contemplated by the Constitution. And as this is considered, the reverent thought may not be repressed that the result is due to the wise foresight of the fathers manifested in State constitutions even before the adoption of the Constitution of the United States by which they substituted for the intermingling of the legislative and judicial power to deal with contempt as it existed in the House of Commons a system permitting the dealing with that subject in such a way as to prevent the obstruction of the legislative powers granted and secure their free exertion and yet at the same time not substantially interfere with the great guaranties and limitations concerning the exertion of the power to criminally punish—a beneficent result which additionally arises from the golden silence by which the framers of the Constitution left the subject to be controlled by the implication of authority resulting from the powers granted.

It is suggested in argument that whatever be the general rule, it is here not applicable because the House was considering and its committee contemplating impeachment proceedings. The argument is irrelevant because we are of opinion that the premise upon which it rests is unfounded. But indulging in the assumption to the contrary we think it is wholly without merit, as we see no reason for holding that if the situation suggested be assumed it authorized a disregard of the plain purposes and objects of the Constitution as we have stated them. Besides, it must be apparent that the suggestion could not be accepted without the conclusion that under the hypothesis stated the implied power to deal with contempt as ancillary to the legislative power had been transformed into judicial authority and become subject to all the restrictions and limitations imposed by the Constitution upon that authority—a conclusion which would frustrate and destroy the very purpose which the proposition is advanced to accomplish and would create a worse evil than that which the wisdom of the fathers corrected before the Constitution of the United States was adopted. How can this be escaped, since it is manifest that if the argument were to be sustained those things which, as pointed out in In re Chapman, supra, were distinct, and did not therefore the one frustrate the other—the implied legislative authority to compel the giving of testimony and the right criminally to punish for failure to do so—would become one and the same and the exercise of one would therefore be the exertion of, and the exhausting of the right to resort to, the other? Again, accepting the proposition, by what process of reasoning could the conclusion be escaped that the right to exert implied authority by way of contempt proceedings, in so far as essential to preserve legislative power, would become itself an exertion of legislative power, and thus at once be subject to the limitations as to modes of trial exacted by the guaranty of the Constitution on that subject? We repeat, out of abundance of precaution, we are called upon to consider not the legislative power of Congress to provide for punishment and prosecution under the criminal laws in the amplest degree for any and every wrongful act, since we are alone called upon to determine the limits and extent of an ancillary and implied authority essential to preserve the fullest legislative power, which would necessarily perish by operation of the Constitution if not confined to the particular ancillary atmosphere from which alone the power arises and upon which its existence depends.

It follows from what we have said that the court below erred in refusing to grant the writ of habeas corpus and its action must be, and it is, therefore, reversed, and the case remanded with directions to discharge the relator from custody.

And it is so ordered.

Mr. Speaker, I quote from newspapers representative of the general feeling of the people in regard to this proposed law. In a lengthy editorial the New York American, on April 30, 1917, said in conclusion:

As you well know, our great Bill of Rights was appended to the Constitution in the form of the 10 amendments, and the very first of these which our fathers so wrote into the supreme law of the land is this:

"Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press."

Now, gentlemen of the Congress, there are not two consecutive paragraphs in this unconstitutional and tyrannical espionage bill which do not, either by permission or by mandate, attempt to abridge and to coerce and to destroy the freedom of speech and the freedom of the press.

And if you pass such a bill you are false to your oaths, false to the command of the Constitution you are sworn to obey and to uphold, false to your people, false to the liberties and the rights guaranteed to you and to your children, false to our noble traditions of freedom, false to the living and false to the dead who died that these institutions and promises of liberty might be the heritage of free Americans in free America through centuries upon centuries of representative constitutional government.

If you fail in your duty now, if you crouch like whipped dogs at the crack of the lash, if you do not maintain your own and your people's rights and liberties, you are not fit to represent a free people, and you will go down to posterity covered with the contempt and the resentment of those better and braver times which we still have faith to believe await our children and the Republic, which, please God, shall not perish either at the hands of foreign enemies or of the more dangerous domestic sycophants and lickspittles who would graft upon our national spirit and character the baseness and slavishness of their own contemptible and mean-spirited abasement in the dust at the feet of their rightful servants in office.

Not long ago the New York Times published the following editorial:

THE CENSORSHIP.

In the espionage bill now before Congress awaiting its consideration there is a section giving to the Government the power of censorship over the press, although the bill is professedly designed only to deal with spies. As it stands in the bill this section makes it possible for the Government to assume complete control over all the newspapers of the country, to abolish and suppress the freedom of the press guaranteed by the Constitution. In the guise of safeguards against giving information of value to the enemy it puts it in the power of the Government to prevent absolutely the publication of news relating to war.

It would appear that this section has been drawn as a bill to punish the crimes of theft, arson, or murder would be drawn, with the plain intent to confer the broadest possible powers. Yet it is sufficiently obvious that under our Constitution an emergency censorship act in time of war should in its scope be strictly limited to the immediate purpose of preventing the publication of news prejudicial to the success of military operations. It would be a monstrous abuse of legislative authority to attempt to put into the hands of the Government the power to interfere with the legitimate business of the newspapers.

It is quite beside the mark to argue that this power would not be exercised—it should never be conferred. The line of distinction between justified censorship and unwarrantable encroachment upon the freedom of the press is plain. If any Senators or Members of the House believe that it would be to the advantage of the Government to deprive the people of the means of knowing what is going on, or the Government of the daily opportunity to know the thoughts and feelings of the people, a candid retrospective consideration of the manner in which the newspapers of the United States during the past six months have served the cause of democracy, human rights, and American honor by bringing home to Congress and the administration the will and desires of the people would remove that delusion. The newspapers of the country will faithfully comply with any reasonable requests or regulations of the Government. It is not even necessary that the requests should have the special authority of a statute. The press is as patriotic as the Congress.

On May 1, 1917, the Philadelphia Inquirer printed an editorial reading:

SHALL CONGRESS MUZZLE THE NEWSPAPERS?

With the Army bill virtually out of the way, Congress is to take up and dispose of the so-called espionage measure. That measure contains a provision for gagging and muzzling the newspapers, in direct violation of the mandate of the Federal Constitution, which declares that "Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press."

When it comes to dealing with spies and traitors, we care not how drastic legislation may be. But we enter an emphatic protest against any scheme which has in view a censorship that can not but fail to play havoc with the country.

England, plunged into war without the slightest preparation for it, committed many blunders. She has had to experiment and feel her way, and these experiments were generally very costly. One of the most grievous of her mistakes was the suppression of news. It created suspicion. It bred distrust. Because of this suspicion and distrust, the truth, when told, was only half believed.

We implore Congress to take warning and be governed in the light of England's experience.

Movements of troops or of naval vessels or any information that would be valuable to the enemy should be denied publication, otherwise the press should be left free. It can be trusted. It has been eager to comply with requests from the State, War, and Navy Departments. Shipping news, for instance, is practically abandoned. The dates of steamship sailings are no longer put in print. It is foolish in the extreme to note the arrival of a vessel which has escaped the submarines at "an American port," for when a vessel is safe, that is all there is to it. The fact that she arrived at Philadelphia or New York or Liverpool can be of no advantage to Germany. But the opinion of the Navy Department is honored in this respect, as is every other request.

So the press can be trusted, and it ought to be. Forbid the printing of information of value to the enemy, but do not pass a gag law that would suppress legitimate news or repress truth. Truth can not be successfully mangled for any length of time. Truth harms no one. It is the half truth that matters—the half truth that is in itself a lie or a deception. Muzzle the newspapers and we shall have a Nation distrustful of the Government, fearful that facts are concealed that ought to be made public.

To gag the newspapers would be the most disastrous thing that Congress possibly could do.

Let me read from to-day's Washington Times, which prints the following editorial:

IS THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES STRONG ENOUGH AND SOUND ENOUGH FOR WAR TIME?

This Nation has not as yet gone deep into war. We have announced war, we are preparing for it, that is all.

With the war only beginning a democratic administration discovers that the Constitution is too weak, or too tolerant for the United States of to-day.

Washington managed to do his work obedient to the Constitution.

Lincoln fought through the Civil War and did not find that the Constitution needed changing for his sake—his task was not easy.

But the democratic administration of to-day demands, at the mere suggestion of war, that the Constitution be changed, and changed in that part which more than all the rest of the Constitution guarantees freedom—freedom of speech, freedom of the press.

The first amendment to the Constitution that the so-called espionage bill would nullify reads, as follows:

"Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances."

That means freedom of belief and of thought.

Freedom of the press is collective freedom of speech.

The right of the people peaceably to assemble means freedom of the press, for in our day the people do not assemble in the market place as of old, but gather mentally in the columns of the independent newspaper, read by the people simultaneously each day.

And the right of the people "to petition the Government for a redress of grievances" means nothing else than freedom of the press, for it is through the press, the collective voice, that the people make their grievances known.

The dangerous feature of the espionage bill consists in this: Its serious discussion in both Houses of Congress indicates that the Government not only questions but denies the right and ability of the people to manage their affairs.

The study of mammoth forms in extinct animal life proves that when a creature grows too huge, fat, and heavy it can no longer care for itself and disappears.

Is the Democratic administration to prove that what was true of the dinosaur in its day is true now of the big, heavy, rich American Republic?

Our Nation can distribute billions among its friends, and safely promise billions more every year. Has that Nation grown so big and rich that it can not govern itself, can not be trusted to speak or think for itself?

The Democratic administration and the Congressmen that support the espionage bill declare that the United States has outgrown the ability to govern itself. When they insist upon their espionage bill they declare their belief that the people can no longer be trusted with self-government.

The nations at war in Europe have spent about a hundred billions of money, have lost millions of lives, have been fighting desperately for almost three years, yet free speech still lives among them.

Every day Northcliffe and a dozen others in England, Harden and a hundred others in Germany, representatives of free speech in France, Italy, Greece, and even Turkey, print and say that which in the United States, under the espionage bill, would put a man in jail.

Have we really come to such a pass? Must the people of this country be led like a tame bear with a ring in its nose, an elected public servant holding and pulling the string?

Have we, swimming in wealth, lost the power of self-government, as the monstrous whale, according to Darwin, lost the use of the legs with which it once walked on the land?

That question is being thrashed out in the Senate and in the House, and a most important discussion it is for the people of the United States.

Various interests are at work. The cunningest men in the Nation are in Washington, gathered like flies around a molasses jug, planning to get their share of the golden stream that gushes from the Treasury. They object to the free speech that asks questions, to the free press that prints facts.

Inexperienced men are handling great problems for the first time. It would relieve the inefficient to know that press and public were forbidden by law to criticize inefficiency. Burglars like dark streets, and dishonest legislators, arrogant public servants setting themselves above the people, will dislike the light of free discussion, free speech, and a free press.

Every man who votes for a bill that would nullify any clause of the Constitution without first submitting that nullification to the people, in accordance with the Constitution, violates his oath of office. For each has sworn to support the Constitution; and this espionage bill is an attack upon the Constitution.

In voting for the espionage bill the fraudulent public servant votes to give to himself and to the President power to put in jail any citizen who may tell an unpleasant truth or formulate a needed disagreeable criticism concerning either of them.

The espionage bill would give to the President or to any one of five hundred understrappers power to imprison any man for writing what you have just read—power to imprison you if you should say to your neighbor that it is criminal for public servants without public sanction to abolish constitutional guaranties.

Very broad is the language of these gentlemen in their official declaration that the United States dinosaur has outgrown the Constitution.

As Senator BORAH has pointed out, under this espionage bill citizens would be imprisoned, not for violating the law but for violating "regulations." And the President, or those to whom he might delegate the power, could make any regulations.

The espionage bill does away with every democratic principle, including trial by jury. For under that bill you can be fined $10,000 or imprisoned 10 years, or both, not upon conviction by 12 of your fellow citizens but upon the individual decision of the President of the United States that it would be a good idea thus to fine or imprison you.

Eighty years ago, when an American traveled in Turkey and a cross-legged pasha asked him, "How far have you come to see me?" the interpreter warned, "Just say you have come a long way. Don't tell him it's 4,000 miles or he will think you are a liar and put you in jail."

They don't do that, even in Turkey, any more. Are they going to begin it in the United States?

Until lately in Russia the Czar individually could decide that it was wise to jail, fine, or execute his subjects.

Is the United States Congress about to give to the President the power that the Russian people have just taken from the Czar?

Back of this espionage bill you will find—

The desire of inefficiency to escape criticism.

The desire of dishonesty to avoid exposure.

The desire of official power to escape control by the public that created it.

But dishonesty tempted by the sight of seven golden billions, official vanity eager for absolute power, and incompetent conceit dreading just criticism are minor details in this degrading and shameful discussion of the espionage bill.

Here is the danger signal.

The greatest Republic in the world begins a war announcing that it is fighting the fight of democracy. And it begins that war by questioning the very existence of democracy, denying the wisdom of the constitutional theory that the people are able to govern themselves, fit to control the servants whom they employ, and to be trusted with freedom of thought and speech.

The Congressman who votes for the espionage bill expresses contempt for those that put him where he is.

"Monarchies are destroyed by poverty, republics by wealth."

The French philosopher who said that would study with interest the official hirelings of this gigantically rich Republic solemnly discussing "in an emergency" the nullification of the United States Constitution.

Now, I can go a step further, and I say that the press of this country, regardless of the enactment of any law by Congress, will publish the facts either as to adulterated food being given to the men who go to fight our battles or as to an improper plan of campaign, or as any wrongdoing by an official, be he high or low, poor or rich. You can not stifle the press of the United States by the enactment of laws that are clearly unconstitutional. Who is it that fears the truth? That question has not been answered by anyone here.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman please inform us what clause of the Constitution he relies upon to protect these newspaper publishers from indictment in districts distant from where they live?

Mr. SIEGEL. I rely on the decisions of the Supreme Court and on one of the amendments to our Constitution.

Mr. MANN. Article VI of the amendments to the Constitution.

Mr. SIEGEL. Let me read to you a short dispatch that appeared in to-day's Washington Post. I ask you whether you care to have a similar state of affairs in this country:

BERESFORD THREATENS TO REVEAL SEA HAVOC IN SPITE OF CENSOR.

LONDON, May 1.

Admiral Lord Beresford, speaking in London to-day and complaining of the incompleteness of the official returns of the submarine sinkings, said that the losses were appalling.

He declared that he was so keen on the matter that he was inclined to risk the penalties of the defense of the realm act and tell the people himself, because until they were informed they would not realize the importance of economy.

Whenever you try to keep something away from the people you are showing a distrust in their loyalty and in their patriotism. Do not imagine for a single moment that you can proceed here and enact laws and enforce them if those laws do not meet with the approval of public opinion. You will never get a conviction under this proposed statute against a single newspaper in any of the large cities of the country, because you can not get convictions under any law that does not meet with public approval; and I assert that there is no public demand for the enactment of any such statute as is proposed here in section 4.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. SIEGEL. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. I do not know whether we are getting all the truth with regard to the western front——

Mr. SIEGEL. I do not think for a moment that we are.

Mr. FESS. Do you think that the sparsity of news is due to the fact that the law will not permit the publication, or is it a matter of public policy not to publish it?

Mr. SIEGEL. I take it for granted that if the law in the various belligerent countries under their censorship statutes and regulations prohibit the sending of news, it is directly resulting in our not getting certain news giving us the true facts.

Mr. FESS. Do you think that we would do any better—that we would have any more accurate information—if there was not any censorship at all?

Mr. SIEGEL. In Europe?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. SIEGEL. Undoubtedly. There is no question about that. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE].

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, when this bill was originally introduced it did not satisfy me. As it was amended at various times and stages it did not satisfy me, and I regret that it is necessary to pass such laws as this.

I believe that we must have some law upon these subjects, and particularly do I believe that there must be some provision along the line of that contained in section 4, that has been attacked so much here to-day. I have heard enunciated upon this floor by two Members of this House a doctrine with which I do not agree, and against which I want to utter my protest now. That is the statement that the newspapers of this country are above the law; that we can pass laws for individuals, but that newspapers will not and can not be expected to obey the law. I do not agree with that sentiment, and I protest against it now.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Will the gentleman give the names of the Members who said that newspapers were above the law? I did not hear them speak.

Mr. IGOE. The substance of what they said was that the newspapers would not obey this law, and that newspapers would not be convicted. One was the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL] and the other was the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK].

Mr. SIEGEL. Do you think you will obtain a conviction in New York under this law, where a newspaper publishes something which it is in the public interest to expose?

Mr. IGOE. I hope it will never be necessary to bring a prosecution under it; but if it is enacted into law, and it is necessary to bring proceedings, then for the sake of the country and for the sake of the good name of the city of New York I hope we will be able to get convictions under it if it is violated. [Applause.]

The only purpose of the section is to prevent information going to the enemy that might be useful to him—information concerning the national defense. Now, I think that we will all agree, and I think the newspapers do agree, that it is necessary to prevent that information going to the enemy. Now that we all want to prevent it, what is the best way in which to do it? I will remind the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL] that the newspapers of his city sent to another body a draft of a law relating to the censorship, which was more drastic than this proposed law, and if it had been enacted the President of the United States could have done much more to prevent publication than he could do under this section as drawn.

I want to say that I believe in the policy of preserving to the citizens and to the newspapers the right to criticize the actions of the Government and of its officials, and it was with that purpose that the committee wrote the proviso into this section.

I want to repudiate, too, the suggestion that the newspapers have any greater right than the people of this country, or that there is any distinction between the freedom of the press and freedom of speech, both of them resting upon the same ground. The mere fact that the Constitution states that we shall pass no law abridging freedom of speech or of the press does not mean and never has meant that we could pass no law punishing certain violations of the right of printing and speaking.

Justice Story, defining liberty of the press says:

That every man shall have a right to speak, write, and print his opinions upon any subject whatsoever, without any prior restraint, so always that he does not injure any other person in his rights, person, property, or reputation; and so always that he does not thereby disturb the public peace or attempt to subvert government.

The Supreme Court of Missouri, in Ex Parte Harrison (212 Mo., 88), said:

The constitutional liberty of speech and of press grants the right to freely utter and publish whatever a citizen may desire, and to be protected in so doing, provided always that such publications are not blasphemous, obscene, seditious, or scandalous in their character, so that they become an offense against the public and by their malice and falsehood injuriously affect the character, reputation, or pecuniary interest of individuals.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest the distinction between freedom of speech and freedom of the press—that the freedom of speech has reference to an individual, while freedom of the press is the right enjoyed not only by the press and publishers of the country but it is a right to which the people of the country are entitled, a universal right, and that there should be freedom of the press in order that the people themselves may get together.

Mr. IGOE. I think they both rest upon the same principle. Now let me read from the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the case of Robertson v. Baldwin (165 U. S., p. 275, L. C. 281):

The law is perfectly well settled that the first 10 amendments to the Constitution, commonly known as the Bill of Rights, were not intended to lay down any novel principles of government, but simply to embody certain guaranties and immunities which we had inherited from our English ancestors, and which had from time immemorial been subject to certain well-recognized exceptions arising from the necessities of the case. In incorporating these principles into the fundamental law there was no intention of disregarding the exceptions, which continued to be recognized as if they had been formally expressed. Thus the freedom of speech and of the press does not permit the publication of libels, blasphemous or indecent articles, or other publications injurious to public morals or private reputation; the right to keep and bear arms is not infringed by laws prohibiting the carrying of concealed weapons.

There is a case from the State courts of New York, which is a famous case, and I have no doubt the gentleman from New York is familiar with it. I want to read from it briefly. It is a case of The People v. Most (171 N. Y., 423). The gentleman's State undertakes to protect the freedom of speech and the freedom of the press. In that case Most had published some article in an anarchistic paper, and in the course of the decision the Supreme Court of the State of New York said, referring to this provision of the Constitution:

While the right to publish is thus sanctioned and secured, the abuse of that right is excepted from the protection of the Constitution, and authority to provide for and punish such abuse is left to the legislature. The punishment of those who publish articles which tend to corrupt morals, induce crime, or destroy organized society is essential to the security of freedom and the stability of the State. While all the agencies of government—executive, legislative, and judicial—can not abridge the freedom of the press, the legislature may control and the courts may punish the licentiousness of the press.

And again, in the same decision, the court says of the constitutional provision:

It places no restraint upon the power of the legislature to punish the publication of matter which is injurious to society according to the standard of the common law. It does not deprive the State of the primary right of self-preservation.

It does not sanction unbridled license nor authorize the publication of articles prompting the commission of murder or the overthrow of government by force. All commentators contrast the liberty of the press with its licentiousness and condemn as not sanctioned by the constitution of any State appeals designed to destroy the reputation of the citizen, the peace of society, or the existence of government.

In the case of State v. McKee (73 Conn., 18), a decision was rendered in a prosecution brought under an act making it a criminal offense to sell or offer to sell, lend, or give a paper principally made up of criminal news, police reports, stories of lust and crime. It was held that the act did not violate a constitutional provision that no law should be passed to restrain liberty of speech or freedom of the press. The court said:

The right to discuss public matters stands in part on the necessity of that right to the operation of a government by the people, but with this exception: The right of every citizen to freely express his sentiments on all subjects stands on the broad principle which supports the equal right of all to exercise gifts of property and faculty in any pursuit in life; in other words, upon the essential principles of civil liberty as recognized by our Constitution. Every citizen has an equal right to use his mental endowments, as well as his property, in any harmless occupation or manner; but he has no right to use them so as to injure his fellow citizens or to endanger the vital interests of society. Immunity in the mischievous use is as inconsistent with civil liberty as prohibition of the harmless use. Both arise from the equal right of all to protection of law in the enjoyment of individual freedom of action, which is the ultimate fundamental principle.

I contend that if the Government can pass a law punishing a libel, if it can pass a law punishing Most for putting into a paper anarchistic sentiments, certainly laws can be passed that will protect the very Government which undertakes to guarantee to the individual these very rights of free speech and press. And so there are restrictions on the liberty of the press; and when the gentleman from New York says that these proposed regulations are unconstitutional, I can not agree with him. I believe they are constitutional. As to whether or not it is wise, whether or not it is the best policy, that, of course, is a question for the Congress to decide.

I regret that it is necessary to pass laws to prohibit the publication of these things, but I believe that a majority, in fact nearly all, of the newspapers of this country are in favor of some regulation that will prevent publication of certain information.

Now, I beg to submit to this House that the newspaper owner who intends to obey the law, who has been obeying this voluntary censorship, ought to ask for some such law as this for his own protection. Because if there is no law, there can be no punishment of any violation of these restrictions, and the law-abiding newspaper and those who want to abide by reasonable rules that will be adopted will be handicapped by those newspapers that do not want to obey the restrictions. I believe that we ought to try and write the section so that freedom of criticism of the acts of the Government and officials may be preserved, and we ought to try and fix it so that only those publications of things respecting the national defense that will be useful to the enemy will be prohibited.

The strange thing about it is this. Newspapers a week ago were insisting that we had to pass the measure recommended by those in charge during the emergency here, while to-day they express dissatisfaction or distrust of the same officials who would pass upon some things that will affect their rights in some small degree. We all have to give up during the war some privileges that have been dear to us. I believe we must put this power in the hands of some one. The moment you try to write into the statute things you want to prohibit, just that moment you get into difficulty, because no man can say what may be necessary to be prohibited to-morrow. And so while I have given my approval and sanction to this measure, I would be glad if some one could submit an amendment that will make it clearer, if possible, that the individual and the newspapers can have the freedom of criticizing the conduct of affairs by Government officials.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IGOE. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not think this section should apply to peace as well as to war. Why not leave it to the judgment of the President as to what shall be published in a time of peace?

Mr. IGOE. I do not know whether the gentleman asks that in a sarcastic vein or not.

Mr. WALSH. No; I am asking the gentleman to state the reason for the position that he takes.

Mr. IGOE. There are a good many powers that I would give to the President in time of war that I would not give him in time of peace. The gentleman will find, and so will the rest of us before we get through, that he will have to place more responsibility on the President, or some one else, if we are going to carry on a war successfully. As the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VENABLE] said a little while ago, there are many things, many powers that we will have to give to the President in this war in order to be successful.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IGOE. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I take it from the gentleman's remarks that he conceives the measure to be somewhat too drastic, and to embrace more than it ought.

Mr. IGOE. I will say that if the President wants to, he can go very far under this language in preventing criticism or in preventing the publication of news, but he could not go as far as he could have gone if the suggestion of the New York newspapers had been written into the law.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am not interested in the New York newspapers, I am interested in something greater than the newspapers, I am interested in the question of suppressing the privileges of the press.

Mr. IGOE. The gentleman must remember that anything that affects the newspaper will affect the individual. When I speak of the rights of the newspaper I am speaking of the rights of the gentleman's constituents, all governed by the same section.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Did the committee gather any information that was justified in taking this drastic stand?

Mr. IGOE. The Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy asked the Congress to write some such law.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. A very feeble justification.

Mr. IGOE. Then we have had a very feeble justification for many things that we have done within the last few weeks.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And you will live to regret it.

Mr. DILLON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IGOE. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DILLON. I would like to ask the gentleman if he thinks that Congress can delegate to the Executive the power to say what shall constitute a crime when Congress does not know what it is, and can Congress fix a penalty for something that it does not know what it is?

Mr. IGOE. I will say that there is no question about the constitutionality of that delegation. The gentleman from North Carolina will address himself to that particular phase of this discussion later.

Congress says in this proposed statute that the publication of certain information that might be useful to the enemy shall be an offense, and it leaves to the President the right to say what information in his opinion will be useful and ought to be prohibited.

Mr. DILLION. I would not doubt it if Congress made specifications, a bill of particulars, and then allowed the President to issue his proclamation in reference to those specifications.

Mr. IGOE. I will say to the gentleman that the Supreme Court has passed upon that question, and I do not think there is any question about the constitutionality of that particular feature.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

By unanimous consent, Mr. IGOE was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEELE].

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the committee on Monday went over the provisions of this bill very fully and very carefully, and the debate has disclosed the fact that there are but few provisions of the bill which really have received any serious opposition. The principal opposition, as I understand the debate as it has run along thus far, is directed against section 4 of the first title of the bill. Some of the legal questions arising out of that section have been discussed by the gentleman who preceded me—the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE]—and, without attempting to repeat what he has no doubt better said, I shall confine myself to a few other aspects of that section, and particularly with reference to the question asked him at the conclusion of his argument.

Section 4, as I read the section, attempts to do certain things. It attempts to give the President power in time of war, or when war is threatened, to issue a proclamation promulgating certain rules and regulations relating to the national defense, and those rules and regulations are limited by the further stipulation that they must relate to what would be useful to the enemy. When the question is asked, "Why not make a similar regulation in time of peace?" the answer is apparent upon the face of the section that there is nothing that would be useful to the enemy in time of peace. Therefore what is provided for in this section is that the President, who is also, under the Constitution, Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, shall have the further authority to issue his proclamation relating to the subject matter of the section.

The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] referred to a principle of constitutional law which to my mind has received the sanction of the Supreme Court, and that is this: The President as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy has certain constitutional rights, of which Congress can not deprive him. As Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy he can prepare plans for purposes of common defense and can execute them and, with reference to the performance of these duties, Congress can not deprive him. Therefore while Congress has the power, as I view it, under the Constitution to declare war, to appropriate funds, which is its duty, the execution of the duties placed upon the President as Commander in Chief is within his constitutional authority; and within his constitutional authority, therefore, he would have the right to punish whatever would be contrary to the usages of military law. It would be highly improper, it would seem to me, to vest a divided authority over the subject you are treating in this section. It all ought to be vested in one person, because the line of division between his authority as Commander in Chief of the Army and the authority vested in Congress to make rules and regulations for the government of the Army and Navy has not been defined in the Constitution, and therefore it might be difficult to say where the line of division lies. Therefore, and wisely it seems to me, under this section these powers are vested in the same person that the Constitution makes Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. This concrete statement of what I understand the law to be was stated by the Supreme Court in ex parte Milligan, where that court said:

> Congress has the power not only to raise and support and govern armies but to declare war. It has, therefore, the power to provide by law for carrying on war. This power necessarily extends to all legislation essential to the prosecution of war with vigor and success, except such as interferes with the command of the forces and the conduct of campaigns. That power and duty belong to the President as Commander in Chief. Both these powers are derived from the Constitution, but neither is defined by that instrument. Their extent must be determined by their nature and the principles of our institutions.

What are the nature and what are the principles of our institutions are left vague in the Constitution and they are left vague in the decision of the Supreme Court. In order to prevent any divided authority upon this subject, it seems to me that it is the purpose of the section to vest it in one single authority who can properly exercise it.

A question was asked the gentleman who preceded me as to whether or not the power to promulgate these rules and regulations that are mentioned in this section is not a delegation of legislative authority to the President beyond the power of Congress. That question, it seems to me, has also been decided by the Supreme Court. In no real sense, as the Supreme Court has said, in the promulgating of these rules and regulations is the President exercising any legislative authority. All that he is doing is carrying out what Congress has already said. Congress has said in the statute, if it is enacted, what the policy of Congress shall be with reference to it. He is authorized to promulgate rules and regulations with reference to the national defense, and what would be useful to the common enemy, but that is leaving to him details which are administrative in their character, and not legislative.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEELE. Yes.

Mr. MANN. By this section, as I understand it, Congress itself does not prohibit the publication of information which may be useful to the enemy. There is no prohibition in the section as I read it?

Mr. STEELE. No.

Mr. MANN. So that it is left to the President whether there shall be a prohibition.

Mr. STEELE. It is said there may be a prohibition——

Mr. MANN. Well, it is left to the President whether there will be a prohibition.

Mr. STEELE. Yes.

Mr. MANN. If this is not legislation I do not know what legislation is.

Mr. STEELE. If the gentleman will read the section carefully——

Mr. MANN. Well, I have read it carefully a dozen times, and that is probably more than any member of the committee.

Mr. STEELE. The policy that is enacted by Congress and what is prohibited by the section is this, that the conveying or publication of information relating to the national defense which will be useful to an enemy; that is the thing that is prohibited.

Mr. MANN. There is nothing prohibited by the section. I have had occasion to draw a good many laws now on the statute books where violation of regulations is made a misdemeanor and penalized, but in every case Congress has first declared that such thing is prohibited, and then provided for regulation or provided that under regulation that prohibition may be removed. I do not think the gentleman can find on the statute books anywhere a single provision of law that leaves to an executive the authority to determine whether a thing shall be a misdemeanor or penalized or not.

Mr. STEELE. Is the gentleman familiar with the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of the United States against Grimaud, given in Two hundred and twentieth United States?

Mr. MANN. I am not as familiar with the decisions of the Supreme Court as I am with legislation, and I have been all over these decisions in the preparation of legislation.

Mr. STEELE. If the gentleman recalls that decision, Congress enacted a statute which vested in the Secretary of Agriculture power to make rules and regulations with reference to forest lands of the country.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. STEELE. I yield.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Conceding now what the gentleman says is correct, that there is a constitutional power which the gentleman mentions, does the gentleman think it is advisable for a legislative body to try to vest some other department of the Government with legislative authority such as this in time of peace?

Mr. STEELE. This does not deal with time of peace, that is a question entirely outside; what I am discussing——

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Then the only reason the gentleman would give is that it is in time of war, is that true?

Mr. STEELE. I wish to say to the gentleman that Congress has exercised that right and that power from the beginning of this Government. You will find in the case of Field v. Clark (143 U. S.), with reference to a provision in the tariff act of 1890 conferring upon the President power to make proclamation that wherever any foreign country should not give the same rates as the United States gave to it, or reciprocal rates, the President shall issue a proclamation, and then certain regulations should exist between those countries, and in that case the Supreme Court reviewed the history of legislation upon this subject showing that from the very beginning of the history of the Government Congress vested such powers in the various departments of the Government.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Does not the gentleman believe, however, that it is always advisable when you are making a penalty for the violation of a certain act that it is always advisable to write not only the terms of the crime but the penalty in the statute rather than leave it to some one to issue regulations from time to time?

Mr. STEELE. In answer to the gentleman I will say that the penalty is particularly set forth in this section.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes; but the crime is not.

Mr. STEELE. The crime, to my mind, is.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I do not think so.

Mr. STEELE. The President's rules and regulations must be confined to the language of the section which has reference to the national defense.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I think the gentleman will agree with me that the crime is defined from time to time by the Executive for which the regulation is issued——

Mr. STEELE. If the gentleman will pardon me, when the gentleman interrupted me I was about to explain the decision of the United States v. Grimaud. In that case Congress conferred upon the Secretary of Agriculture the power to promulgate rules and regulations upon the subject of forest lands. The Secretary did promulgate them. In that same statute Congress provided the penalty as is attempted to be provided in this section, and under that section the violator of those rules and regulations was indicted in the Federal court, and the case was taken to the Supreme Court, and the constitutionality of the provision was assailed in the Supreme Court, and the act was there sustained as a valid piece of legislation, so that, so far as any attempt is concerned to assail this statute on the ground that it delegates legislative authority under these various decisions. that contention must fall. I wish also to say for the information of the gentleman that in the debate in the Senate upon the provisions of the espionage bill before them the cases that I have referred to, or some of them at least, were also referred to as sufficient authority to sustain this provision.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEELE. I will.

Mr. WALSH. In reference to the case the gentleman stated, was it not a fact that the Government owned the lands, one of the essential elements in the trial and decision of that case, and this is not at all similar?

Mr. STEELE. I said awhile ago it had relation to forest lands——

Mr. WALSH. Owned by the Government.

Mr. STEELE. I do not see that makes any difference, because the same provision practically is in the pure-food laws and various other laws where similar authority is conferred upon departments of the Government.

Mr. WALSH. But in those lines there is a direct prohibition included in the law by the Congress, is there not?

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, I drew the pure-food law as it stands, and it is directly contrary to the theory of this section 4.

Mr. STEELE. I do not propose to contradict the statement of the gentleman on the subject, but commend to him the decision of the Supreme Court. It lays down a general principle, it seems to me, which can not be gotten away from.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will somebody yield to the gentleman enough time so that he can answer a question?

Mr. WEBB. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEELE] desire more time?

Mr. STEELE. I am quite ready to answer a question.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Is it the contention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that Congress has at any time delegated or the Supreme Court has confirmed the proposition that Congress may delegate the power to any executive body to make regulations with respect to either crimes or punishment?

Mr. WEBB. Will my friend let me read from a statute which is included in the decision of the United States Supreme Court on the subject? It is in the Two hundred and twentieth United States, in the Grimaud case, which my friend has just cited.

Mr. STEELE. Yes, sir.

Mr. WEBB. It says:

> It was also declared that the Secretary "may make such rules and regulations and establish such service as will insure the objects of such reservation, namely, to regulate their occupancy and use and to preserve the forests thereon from destruction; and any violation of the provisions of this act or such rules and regulations shall be punished," as is provided in section 5388, chapter 3, page 1044, of the Revised Statutes as amended.

Now, the Supreme Court held that that was a valid statute and held a man liable to punishment for violating the rules and regulations made by the Secretary.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But in that case did not the act itself prohibit the act complained of?

Mr. WEBB. In that case it left the Secretary to make rules and regulations and provided that a violation of the rules and regulations should be a criminal offense, and the Supreme Court sustained the rule

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is, provided, of course, that the rules and regulations simply construed the act itself rather than that the regulations constituted a crime which was committed?

Mr. WEBB. That is the language of the statute, and I will explain later the interpretation which the Supreme Court gave it.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman permit a question in reference to that?

Mr. WEBB. Of course.

Mr. MANN. The Constitution provides that Congress shall have power to make the needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States. Now, the gentleman may be able to correct me, but I have always understood when Congress made the rule that the Secretary of Agriculture might make rules and regulations that Congress was confined to its authority under the Constitution, because the Government owned the property; and that the same rule did not apply to the general criminal statutes.

Mr. WEBB. I think if my friend will read this decision he will not find such distinction made.

Mr. AUSTIN. May I ask the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary a question?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Mr. AUSTIN. I want to call his attention to an editorial which appeared in the New York American——

Mr. WEBB. I would not want to yield for the reading of an editorial.

Mr. AUSTIN. I would like to ask the gentleman if he has read the editorial and if the statements contained therein are true?

Mr. WEBB. I have read it.

Mr. AUSTIN. What does the gentleman say as to that?

Mr. WEBB. My recollection is it does not refer to section 4.

Mr. AUSTIN. I am asking if it is well founded or not.

Mr. WEBB. I do not think the editorial mentions specifically any section of this bill. It is general criticism of a censorship.

Mr. AUSTIN. What does the gentleman say about the general editorial criticism of the bill?

Mr. WEBB. I do not think it is justified at all. I think the editor there is criticizing the censorship as put into effect in Great Britain. So far as I am able to see, he has not pointed out a single line of this bill to which he objects. It is more of a general criticism against a censorship at large, instead of pointing out definitely the language of this bill he objects to.

Mr. AUSTIN. I have just read it hurriedly here. It says that, while this original bill has been amended, that the amendments do not save it from the criticism it makes.

Mr. WEBB. That is the opinion of the New York American. There are many other great papers that say it does, such as the New York World and other great papers, that are willing to abide by the section. The newspapers of this country that are patriotic—and I believe that most of them are—ought to be willing to help the President to prevent the publication of things that would be of benefit to the enemy in this great conflict.

Mr. AUSTIN. Does the daily press of the country in whole or in part approve the bill now under consideration?

Mr. WEBB. I can not answer that question, of course.

Mr. AUSTIN. Can the gentleman name any leading metropolitan paper which advocates and indorses the pending bill? I am seeking information.

Mr. WEBB. I read in my general statement on Monday afternoon an editorial from the New York World commending section 4 as presented by this committee. The trouble with most of the papers is that they are referring to the bill presented in February and reintroduced at this special session of Congress, and not this bill before us now, as presented by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. AUSTIN. This seems to be aimed at the present bill. Does the gentleman recall any other paper than the New York World?

Mr. WEBB. I do not recall any paper that is condemning it. I know there is a great effort being made to organize a propaganda among the newspapers to oppose this bill. I do not see why the newspapers should not "take their medicine" in a great fight like this as well as other people. Why they should desire to publish information that the Commander in Chief of the Nation says is useful to the enemy is more than I can understand.

They have been demanding of us, and insisting on it for these many months past, that we stand by the President, insisting that he knows more about all these things than Members of Congress, and now when we go to give him the power to say that they shall not publish certain things useful to the enemy they say we should not pass such measure. I believe in applying the same yardstick to these men just the same as to any other ordinary men in this country.

Mr. AUSTIN. Does the gentleman contend that this bill is an abridgment of the freedom of the press?

Mr. WEBB. I do not believe it is. It is not an abridgment of the freedom of the press unless the press is determined upon destroying the Government. It is a crime to publish scandalous matter now, and it is punishable by law, and if you can stop newspapers in the exercise of their "rights" freely to print such matter and prohibit them from publishing scandalous matter, why not stop them from publishing things that will be useful to the greatest enemy in time of war?

Mr. AUSTIN. I am not assuming that the press of this country is going to publish anything which will endanger the safety or the interests of this country.

Mr. WEBB. Neither am I; and I think, therefore, the newspapers ought not to be "kicking."

Mr. AUSTIN. But I do not believe in applying a radical remedy here to the friends of the Republic and going out of our way to say in advance that we anticipate that they are going to say or do something which will embarrass or injure the Republic.

Mr. WEBB. You might then say that no man will violate the law. The criminal law is made with an intent to catch the criminal. This law is made only to catch the man who wants to publish information that will be useful to the enemy and hurtful to our country. No newspaper ought to be allowed to do it, even if they should want to do it.

Mr. AUSTIN. For more than one hundred years we have not had to anticipate that we would have to have a criminal law infringing the freedom of the press.

Mr. WEBB. Yes; and we have never had the necessity of fighting an enemy 4,000 miles away, and we never before issued a loan of $7,000,000,000. Many things exist now that did not exist 100 years ago, and considering all the powers of communication possessed by our enemy in this country it seems to me that the newspapers ought to hail with delight our attempt here to lay down a rule that would apply to all, instead of allowing one newspaper here and there, with a tip or an inside track, to get information that others would not get and which would be useful to the enemy.

Mr. AUSTIN. We have had many wars. We had the Revolutionary War, and the War of 1812, and the Civil War, and the War with Spain in 1898, and we never yet have found it necessary to put such a law on the statute books, abridging the freedom of the press. The press of this country is absolutely loyal to the country and to the administration. It is the one agency in this country which has aroused public sentiment in favor of military preparedness and the passage of the conscript bill. No agency has had more to do with the passage of that measure than the press of the country.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Does the gentleman believe that the press of this country has changed materially in the last few years?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; I do.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. The language of the bill is, "The President may prohibit the publishing of any information which in his judgment" is not so-and-so. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman if that constitutes any abridgment of the freedom of the press?

Mr. WEBB. No; I think not; absolutely not.

Mr. RANDALL. I heard the gentleman answer the question several times, and he has always said, "I think not."

Mr. WEBB. I am only expressing my opinion, as I gather it from the Constitution and the adjudicated cases. I am not a dogmatist. I may be wrong, but that is my opinion.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I wish to ask a brief question. I would like to have the gentleman answer in his own way. An editorial appeared in to-day's Times on this bill. You will find it in the second column. I read:

As Senator BORAH has pointed out, under this espionage bill citizens would be imprisoned not for violating the law but for violating "regulations." And the President, or those to whom he might delegate the power, could make any regulations.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Have you any authority that would warrant Congress in undertaking to delegate to the President the power to define what constitutes a crime? Have you examined that special feature?

Mr. WEBB. No. We do not do that in this section. We make the violation of the prohibition, which we authorize him to make, a crime.

Mr. GORDON. The President defines the prohibition?

Mr. WEBB. Yes. In answer to that let me read what this report, United States, 220, says:

In the nature of things it was impracticable for Congress to provide general regulations for these various and varying details of management. Each reservation had its peculiar and special features, and in authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to meet these local conditions Congress was merely conferring administrative functions upon an agent, and not delegating to him legislative power. The authority actually given was much less than what has been granted to municipalities by virtue of which they make by-laws, ordinances, and regulations for the government of towns and cities.

It has been done often. I have here a collation of a dozen different statutes, where the Congress of the United States has left matters to the President, "if, in his opinion," the public good would require; has left it to the President "if, in his judgment," the laws are not equitable in a foreign country, or "if, in his opinion," so-and-so is required. From the very foundation of the Government to the present time the Congress has always left the execution of the laws and the making of rules and regulations in the discretion of the President and the heads of the departments if, in their opinion, it ought to be done.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman say Congress has ever given the President the power to make rules or regulations the violation of which would send a man to the penitentiary?

Mr. WEBB. Yes. The Post Office laws are full of such regulations, and I just read one of them a moment ago.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I yield to my friend from South Carolina.

Mr. STEVENSON. I understand that Congress prohibits by this section, under penalty, the publication of anything that will be beneficial to the enemy, and merely delegates to the President the determination and declaration of what will be detrimental. Is not that what the law will be?

Mr. WEBB. That is the point exactly.

Mr. STEVENSON. That the creation of the crime is by the act of Congress, and the designation of what is detrimental to the country and beneficial to the enemy is left to the President.

Mr. WEBB. Absolutely. Now, quoting further from this opinion, which is very exhaustive—and I hope gentlemen who have doubt about this law will get it and read it—the court, citing Field against Clark, in One hundred and forty-third United States, says:

> The legislature can not delegate its power to make a law, but it can make a law to delegate a power to determine some fact or state of things upon which the law makes, or intends to make, its own action depend. To deny this would be to stop the wheels of government. There are many things upon which wise and useful legislation must depend which can not be known to the lawmaking power, and must therefore be a subject of inquiry and determination outside of the halls of legislation.

Justice Lamar cites a dozen different cases to sustain that point of view.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is that the tariff case?

Mr. WEBB. No, sir.

Mr. MASON. Fields against Clark is the tariff case.

Mr. WEBB. That is the tariff case—yes—but the quotation of it is in the Grimaud case, in Two hundred and twentieth United States, which I am reading from.

Mr. RANDALL. That does not cover the point I raised.

Mr. WEBB. No; but there is a double question here. One of my friends has got one end of it and the other the other. The first question is whether Congress can pass a law—not leaving it to the President at all to "pass a law"—prohibiting the press of this country from publishing information which will be useful to the enemy. Now, can we do that? That is the plain question—whether or not you can limit "freedom of speech" in that way. If Congress can not do it, then we will cut out this section. If there is any gentleman who thinks that in a vital conflict like the one in which we are engaged the press of the country has the right to publish information useful to our enemy, and that we can not stop it, then all I have to say is that I am of a different opinion. That is the first question, whether we can constitutionally prohibit that, and I submit that I do not think any good lawyer will say we can not. If we can prohibit the publication of scandalous matter and immoral stuff, with all this "freedom of the press" that is demanded, then why can we not prohibit the publication of information that will be useful to the enemy in the life-and-death struggle in which this country is soon to be engaged? It is absurd to argue the negative.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. There is no question about the right, so far as Congress is concerned; but the question is, Can Congress delegate that power to the President or to anybody else?

Mr. WEBB. I am trying to answer one question at a time. My friend from California [Mr. RANDALL], I understood, took the position that we have no power to abridge the freedom of the press in the way I have just stated. Is not that what my friend means?

Mr. RANDALL. Oh, no; but you can not give the power to the President to say that in his judgment——

Mr. WEBB. One at a time. If you have got the power, first, to abridge the freedom of speech by passing such a law, if we agree on that, the next question is whether we can leave the section as it is written and leave it to the President of the United States to determine what information will be harmful to the Government and useful to the enemy and therefore make its publication a crime. There are two propositions in section 4, and if we are all agreed on the first proposition—and we now seem to be—that the liberty of the press is not so sacred that we can not prohibit it from publishing matter that is useful to the enemy, we have got by the first step. Then the next step is whether under the decisions for the last hundred years we have the right to delegate to the President—if you say it is a delegation—to decide what information would be useful to the enemy, and then let Congress step in and say that such information shall not be published. I contend that there are dozens of cases decided by the Supreme Court of the United States that uphold that view of this proposition.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman stated in answer to a question, and just now has repeated it, that this bill by its terms prohibits the publication of information useful to the enemy and delegates to the President only the power to determine what character of information he deems will be useful to the enemy. I would like to have the gentleman point out where in this bill there is any prohibition against the publication of information useful to the enemy.

Mr. WEBB. It is in the proclamation of the President——

Mr. LENROOT. Oh!

Mr. WEBB. We do not prohibit the publication of information useful to the enemy, for we do not know what information is useful to the enemy, and therefore we delegate to the President the power to determine what information it is, and then, if it is published, we make the publication a crime.

Mr. LENROOT. Then if Congress does not prohibit that, but delegates to the President the power to do it—in other words it delegates to the President the power to make a law.

Mr. WEBB. No; if the President does not make any proclamation which is in the nature of a public statute, then there is no information which is prohibited from being published.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield further, because we all want information about this?

Mr. WEBB. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. There are two cases, one the case of Field against Clark, which the gentleman has referred to. In Field against Clark the sole power given to the President was to determine facts, and upon the determination of facts by him, then the law of Congress operated in reference to reciprocity.

Mr. WEBB. That is what we do in this section, give him the power to determine whether or not the information will be useful to the enemy. That is for him to determine.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; but in Field against Clark the law gave to the President the power to determine whether a certain fact existed. To make this case parallel we have first to prohibit the publication of information useful to the enemy and then properly to delegate to the President to determine the character of the information.

In the other case the gentleman is aware that those decisions were sustained on the ground that Congress had declared a general policy that it is impossible for Congress to follow in all the details, and therefore the Congress could delegate to the Secretary of the Interior or to the Agricultural Department the power to make rules and regulations to carry out the purpose of the law, but nowhere did it sustain the right to delegate to the Secretary of the Interior the power to make the law or make the prohibition.

Mr. WEBB. Exactly what the committee did do; it gave to the Secretary of the Interior the power to make rules and regulations, and whoever violated them would be guilty of a crime.

I want to say this: That if you want to undertake to designate the character of all information that you want to prohibit the newspapers publishing during the entire war, put it in the bill and see where you find yourself.

Mr. GORDON. Do you require the President to specify the character of the information or disclosures which would render the offender amenable to the law?

Mr. WEBB. I think he would be required to describe the character of the information.

Mr. GORDON. Oh, the character; would he not have to describe the act?

Mr. WEBB. No; he would not.

Mr. GORDON. Then the person would never know whether he was violating the law or not.

Mr. WEBB. He would designate information for national defense, movement of troops, movement of vessels, the establishment of forts, laying of mines, and a hundred other things that you can not think of and I could not think of, and that is why we think best to leave the character of the information to the President. If you want to specify these things, go ahead and put them in and see how deep water you get into.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not think that the great danger in prohibiting the right of the press to publish certain things is not the constitutional question, but is it not this, to give to one person, be he President of the United States or not, the power to shut out the light of public opinion?

Mr. WEBB. I admit that it is a great power to give anybody.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Is it not too great a power to give one man?

Mr. WEBB. It is a great power to give one man to send boys away from the United States to death and battle whereever he sees fit to send them—a much greater power than we give here. If he abuses the power, we have given the express right in the bill that nothing shall prohibit the criticism of every act that he may perform or that you and I may perform. If he abuses his powers, the newspapers will have a right and be quick to criticize him.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Suppose there was a wheat shortage and he sought to prohibit the information of that.

Mr. WEBB. If he should determine that it would be useful to the enemy, he might prevent it. I want to say that we have a President that we can trust.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Yes; but we know the characteristic feature of the President to change his mind.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman touching the word "communicate." I can understand why you might prohibit publishing; you might prohibit any efforts looking to publication, but the word "communicate" is very much broader, and I am informed is very much broader than the word used in a similar act passed in England since the war started.

Mr. WEBB. I think the act the gentleman refers to provides for the prohibition against publishing, communicating, collecting, recording, or attempting to publish or eliciting information concerning so-and-so; it is very broad.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think the gentleman will not find in it the word "communicate." What I am calling attention to is the fact that "communicate" would seem to embrace any sort of communication, whether it led to or was intended to lead to publication. It makes it very much broader than perhaps is required.

Mr. WEBB. That was left in the bill under the belief that the President of the United States would not prohibit the publication and communicating of anything except it was extremely vital to the life of the Government. If that was so, nobody ought to communicate it to the public.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman does not quite meet the point. We can all agree that the President will exercise the power wisely, but that does not excuse us from an obligation of voting only such power as the necessities of the case demands. Now I submit to the gentleman the inquiry as to whether it is necessary to embrace in your prohibition any sort of communication which would embrace a conversation that might not in any way have or be intended to have anything to do with publication, which is what you are really aiming at.

Mr. WEBB. It would be very little profit to prohibit the publication of a thing and then let a man verbally go upon the stump and proclaim it to the public by word of mouth.

Mr. SHERLEY. That would be more than a communication. The gentleman is assuming that "communicate" is the only word whereby you can define the offense. I suggest that is broader than we need. The whole question is a question of degree; we are all agreed as to what we desire to do. The whole question is how we shall do it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is there anything in this bill that would make it a criminal offense, or would the President have the power under the bill to make it a criminal offense to publish the fact that some contractor furnished embalmed beef to the soldiers. During the Spanish War Mr. Roosevelt and some others got up a round robin and denounced that kind of stuff vehemently, and it did a great deal of good. It may have been a breach of the military discipline for all that I know, but they dragged the matter to the light of day. Now, I want to know if there is anything in this bill that would authorize the President or anybody else to squelch a newspaper from giving that kind of information to the American people?

Mr. WEBB. I do not think there is, I will say to my distinguished friend. If there were, I would not support it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. One other question. Suppose it turned out that some general appointed by the President of the United States was undoubtedly incompetent for his command and endangering the lives of his soldiers by his incompetency, has the President under this proposed law or anyone else the right to undertake to squelch the newspapers from publishing criticism of that worthless general?

Mr. WEBB. I think not. We especially preserve that right in line 11:

Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to limit or restrict any discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives or the publication of the same.

I think that protects those situations.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has used 25 minutes and has 51 minutes remaining.

Mr. WEBB. I desire to answer all of the questions I can, but I have promised other gentlemen some time.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I want to ask if the gentleman's attention has been directed to the fact that this section would cover a private conversation or a private letter. For illustration, suppose under this section the President should forbid communicating news of the movement of troops, and a squad of soldiers should go down the road and a farmer who saw them pass his house should say to a neighbor, "I saw a squad of soldiers pass this morning," does the gentleman think that he would be guilty and could be punished under this section?

Mr. WEBB. I do not think so.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. He undoubtedly could be.

Mr. WEBB. I doubt it very much. De minimis non curat lex. That would be too small a matter for the Government to take hold of.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I would call the gentleman's attention to the fact that that maxim does not apply in criminal law.

Mr. RANDALL. Suppose the President had prohibited the publication of information with reference to the movement of this squad of troops from one point to another, under the proviso the gentleman has just read the press would still have the right to criticize that act, and in criticising that act necessarily they would give the information as to the movements, would they not?

Mr. WEBB. I do not know that they would.

Mr. RANDALL. You provide that the newspapers may criticize any act.

Mr. WEBB. Yes; any refusal to let the public know certain things or the character of things.

Mr. RANDALL. Then the information would be given in the act of criticism.

Mr. WEBB. I do not think so. I confess that I think our friends are "running rabbits," while we are after the real "bear" in this fight, and, of course, you can assume that a bad President will do a lot of things, abuse a lot of laws. All laws are subject to abuse, but because a man can be indicted for murder when he is not guilty, or for assault when he is innocent, is no reason why we should not have laws against assault and murder, and because it is possible to abuse a law like this is no reason why we should not bring the law into being.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; for a brief question.

Mr. McCORMICK. I want to be as brief as I can in recurring to the questions of the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]. Do the last six words in the proviso refer, as I assume, to the preceding language of the proviso, or to the language of the section above? If they refer to the proviso, then criticism can only be made upon such facts as are permitted to be published.

Mr. WEBB. Yes; of course, that is correct. Otherwise you would not need to have any law if you were to allow the criticism to expose and publish all of the facts and information useful to the enemy.

Mr. McCORMICK. Precisely. Then all facts the publication of which is forbidden by the President must remain hidden from the public.

Mr. WEBB. That is true, and why not? If the Commander in Chief, who is probably more interested in the success of this Government than anyone else, says that a fact is useful to the enemy, why should you want to publish it in your newspapers?

Mr. McCORMICK. Because, even confessing the gentleman's estimate of his capacity, I still believe that he is not all wise or omnipotent.

Mr. WEBB. I think the same thing, but I think he is wise enough to keep proper facts from these newspapers who want to publish everything about the Government, whether useful to the enemy or not, when they ought not to be allowed to do it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? It is not that we do not desire a law, but does this section afford a law? Can the President of the United States make a crime? Does not the Congress first have to declare the crime, and then you may authorize the President to make rules and regulations respecting it?

Mr. WEBB. We have been discussing that point for the last hour.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not desire to discuss it with the gentleman except to give my opinion.

Mr. WEBB. I have been reading from several Supreme Court opinions on that very question.

Mr. MONTAGUE. But those cases are distinguished from this bill. Congress can not empower the President of the United States to create, to prescribe a crime; Congress must first prescribe what is a crime. A crime must be created by law and not by proclamation.

Mr. CHARLES B. SMITH. On the same question that was asked by the Speaker and was just asked a moment ago, I would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina if, under the provisions of this section, the newspapers would not be prevented from mentioning an act like the failure of the expedition to the Dardanelles, and if they could not mention the act itself, they could not, of course, criticize the President or criticize the expedition or anything in connection with it. Now, certainly nothing better for the English people was done than in connection with this particular criticism of the War Department of Great Britain.

Mr. WEBB. No; I do not think any man would prohibit the publication of what the gentleman calls the failure at the Dardanelles. I do not think the President would prohibit or try to prohibit it. Now, gentlemen, if this House wants to turn a newspaper loose to publish whatever it pleases, in whatever manner it pleases, wherever it pleases, and let it go wherever it pleases, carrying all sorts of information useful to the enemy, the House has the right to do it. We worked over this matter very patiently, and we thought we had a section on which we could all agree by allowing a man who is supposed and probably has as much interest as any man in making a success of this country in this war, to describe these important things that an enemy ought not to get hold of and nobody ought to publish.

Mr. OSBORNE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEBB. Just for a question.

Mr. OSBORNE. I want to ask the gentleman this question: The country has been in war now for a month. I want to ask the gentleman under the self-imposed censorship which now exists if there has been any publication to his knowledge that would give comfort and aid to the enemy?

Mr. WEBB. Oh, I can not answer that. I understand possibly some newspapers have violated this agreement. I do not know which ones, however; but my friend knows that this agreement they made did not bind everybody. Some newspaper may want to get a "scoop," and it will publish a great deal of very important stuff that the enemy may desire to see, whereas reliable newspapers will carry out their agreement. But we ought to have a law to make the fellow who does not want to do it do it, and the newspapers which are willing to keep the censorship, which they have agreed to now, ought to be willing to stand by this "censorship" that we have provided in section 4, because it will make the other fellow who does not want to obey it obey it. Now, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. AUSTIN. I want really to stand by the committee and stand by the administration, but at the same time, in view of the criticisms that are made in the public press I want to ask the gentleman this question.

Mr. WEBB. I am perfectly willing to answer.

Mr. AUSTIN. I desire to ask just this one question. In this afternoon's daily Times, in the editorial column, this appears:

> The nations at war in Europe have spent about a hundred billions of money, have lost millions of lives, have been fighting desperately for almost three years, yet free speech still lives among them.
> Every day Northcliffe and a dozen others in England; Harden and a hundred others in Germany; representatives of free speech in France, Italy, Greece, and even Turkey, print and say that which in the United States under the espionage bill would put a man in jail.

Here is the question: Is that statement correct?

Mr. WEBB. No; I think not, because there is no espionage bill yet, and there will be none until the President of the United States by solemn act proclaims that certain character of information would be useful to the enemy and thereby tell the newspapers not to publish it.

Mr. OSBORNE. Will the gentleman yield for one other question? I recognize, and everybody recognizes, the frankness with which the gentleman is discussing this bill, but I want to ask this question: If it is conceded that there has been no damage in this month of war by the newspapers taking the usual course whch they have taken, is not there danger of doing more harm by the enactment of this section than it would be from what infractions there might come——

Mr. WEBB. Oh, I think the newspapers are honestly trying to carry out the agreement of censorship, but this is intended to make them all carry out and have a law to punish the dishonest fellow who violates the law. I will ask my friend from Minnesota to yield some of his time.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration is really a very important measure and it did appear to this committee who considered it that it was necessary that some such legislation as this ought to be prepared and presented to the House for action. The bill, as you will notice, covers a great many subjects and, although section 4 of Title I appears to be the storm center, there is a vast field of important and valuable legislation promulgated in this proposed measure. Therefore, however we may differ as to the paragraph which has caused this discussion, we ought to remember that the country needs at this time this legislation in order that we may be properly protected and also because part of it is to exist after the war in time of peace and is intended to cover those matters which were brought to light immediately prior to this state of war upon which we have entered, and which seem to be without adequate legislation to enable the Government to take hold of and deal with them. You will notice in the bill that the first title covers what has been called the subject of "espionage." I do not know whether the title is a good one or not, or whether it fully and clearly expresses what is conveyed by the language of the first part of the bill itself. Section 1, under Title I, is a provision for the punishment of anyone obtaining information improperly, or with an improper purpose behind the obtaining of it. Section 2 is a provision punishing the communication or transmission of that information to any foreign country or to any country wherein there is insurrection or to either party to the insurrection in such country. Section 3 is intended to be a punishment for the violation of a trust, and in that connection also where one is intrusted with the care and custody of valuable documents or papers it is intended to cover and provides for punishing gross negligence by which the document or paper is lost or comes into the possession of those who are not entitled to receive it. In regard to the first two sections, the bill differs radically from the one that was presented in the House and committed to us for consideration.

Upon discussion and examination of these sections there was written into them that which safeguards the provisions from being applied to any innocent person. Some one asked the question, "Could not one be arrested who had maps and plans, and so forth, in his possession?" Certainly he might. There is no law passed that can prevent a man from being arrested on suspicion of a violation of the law. But the vital thing in all legislation is to see that no man can be convicted of a crime unless certain essential elements of criminality are found in the case.

Now, the committee wrote into these sections what is and forever ought to be the qualifying element in almost every criminal statute. It is true that with relation to food laws and other matters of that character the mere prohibition of a thing constitutes a criminal act, whether or not there be any intent to do wrong. As, for instance, to forbid the adulteration of some article of food that has to be sold to the public. The public has a right to have the article just as it is or as it ought to be, without the adulteration. And a prohibitive statute may be passed which declares that the simple adulteration may be an offense, and in that class of cases the question of intent is eliminated.

But the thing that is vital in all other criminal legislation is the intent. And the committee has written into these sections the necessary requirement of intent. Whoever with intent or knowledge or reason to believe that the information to be obtained is to be used to the injury of the United States—in respect to any of the matters which follow in that section—shall be guilty of a crime and be punished. The touchstone that must be applied is with what intent did the man obtain the plans, the documents, or the articles, or the information? It must be with the intent to injure the United States. And upon whom does the burden of proof rest in the trial of such a criminal case? It rests upon the Government.

Some one said, "You are making it too difficult for the Government to prove the intent." I submit you can never make it too difficult by the requirement of the prosecution to prove every essential element of criminality. It is necessary that everything which constitutes the crime shall be proved and the burden of proving the intent rests upon the Government in every one of these cases, so that no innocent man is imperiled by the enactment of this into statute.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The words "with intent" do not appear at all in section 4.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Pardon me, but I am coming to that. I will not disturb my course of reasoning now. I will answer that when I reach it.

Mr. SWIFT. Is it a statutory regulation that you have to prove intent?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. If this statute read "whoever obtains any of these documents shall be guilty of a crime," no intent need be proved. But the committee has carefully guarded innocent people who might communicate, who might obtain a photograph of some public work connected with the defense of the country, from being held liable for a criminal act, because the Government must prove affirmatively by some act or deed or word that the person obtaining it had a guilty purpose, to wit, to injure the United States. Now, that applies to the first two sections.

Section 3 has not the intent in it, because it is a breach of trust, and the simple requirement there is "whoever shall willfully and without proper authority" do the things enumerated in that section. That furnishes the basis for conviction under that section.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield——

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON (continuing). For me to call his attention to the fact that it also punishes gross negligence without acting willfully?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I said that. The first part is "whoever willfully communicates or transmits or attempts to communicate or transmit the same to any person, or"—another case—"willfully retains the same or fails to deliver it on demand to the person lawfully entitled to receive it," and then it goes on, "or other gross negligence." There no willfulness is charged. The only thing to be proved in this latter respect is gross negligence. But you must prove such facts and circumstances as will convince the jury that the article in question was lost and its possession parted with through gross negligence on the part of the man who was intrusted with its custody. Surely it is not going too far under this clause to say that the custodian of important documents and papers connected with the public defense must exercise care and caution to preserve them from being lost?

Now we come to section 4.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield a moment on section 3?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. FESS. How broad is the word "information" in the second line? Is it limited by the words that follow it?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. My attention was first called in a critical way to that language and the context to-day, and it is my purpose to offer an amendment to section 3 of this kind, namely, to insert in line 10, on page 35, after the word "to" and before the word "control," the word "or." Then to strike out of line 11, "or being intrusted with any information" and insert the word "any." So that up to this point the paragraph would read:

Whoever, having possession of, access to, or control over, any document, writing, code book, signal book, sketch, photograph, photographic negative, blue print, plan, model, instrument, appliance, or note belonging to the United States relating to the national defense—

And so forth.

And then to take the words "or being intrusted by any such person with any information relating to the national defense" and insert them in the fifteenth line, after the word "defense." This would make the whole paragraph read down to this point:

Whoever, having possession of, access to, or control over, any document, writing, code book signal book, sketch, photograph, photographic negative, blue print, plan, model, instrument, appliance, or note, belonging to, intended for, or under the control of the United States relating to the national defense, or being intrusted with any information relating to the national defense, willfully and without proper authority communicates—

And so forth.

Then I think that section would be perfected and meet the objection which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE] called my attention to here in the House.

As the language stands, it might be susceptible of misinterpretation. For instance, you could read it, eliminating the unnecessary words, "Whoever having possession of information communicates." A man might receive information from some one in the service, a son or a brother, and thus become possessed of information relating to the national defense and communicate it to some one else, because it says "To any other person," and thereby place himself under the condemnation of the act. But with these words changed that result can not be reached, and you will have then a consistent and harmonious enactment.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman kindly suggest that change again? I did not quite follow it before.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. The change is after the word "to," in line 10, insert the word "or"; strike out of line 11 the words "or being intrusted with any information," and substitute therefor the word "any"; then, in line 15, after the word "defense," insert the words "or being intrusted by any such person with any information relating to the national defense."

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. The words "any such person," if that amendment should be adopted, would relate back and apply only to persons having possession of, access to, control over, these documents, writings, note books, and so forth?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Suppose an Army officer intrusted a person with some information, but did not have control over these various things, and this information had no relation to it. If the words "any such person" are used in that connection, it would not be a crime. In other words, to make it a crime the officer would have to have control over those things, although it might have no relation to information that was given out.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. That may be. You can correct that if you think there is any loophole there and cover it. I think the language, however, as suggested will make that provision quite clear and better than it is now, and leave it free from a great many of the constructions that might be put upon that language. Besides, the section is applied to persons having custody, control, possession, or access to the things enumerated, and a military officer not having custody, and so forth, and giving information could be dealt with, and the person receiving the information could be dealt with under the preceding sections if there was any guilty intent, and if there was no intent to wrong the United States there would not be any crime, and there ought not to be any.

Now, as to section 4, I agree with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE] in what he said in his discussion of the law about the constitutional question relating to freedom of speech and of the press, for he holds that every Government has the inherent power to control the freedom of speech or of the press in defense of its own life, as well as in defense of a question of the health or morals of the community, and that constitutional provision must be interpreted always with that thought in mind. Already we have exhibits of how the freedom of speech is curtailed. We have numerous examples of how the freedom of the press is restricted, and yet the constitutional provision is not violated.

There are difficulties connected with this section 4, and I do not think that there was any unanimity of opinion in regard to it on the part of the membership of the Judiciary Committee. I believe that those who finally framed this section and presented it to the House presented the very best thought on the subject which they could muster at that time.

It has been debated here as to whether or not a crime is denounced by the language of this section, and the question of illegal delegated power, as a defect, is also suggested. It seems to me that a crime is properly denounced by the language which the committee has used:

Whoever violates any such prohibition shall be punished.

And the question of delegating power to make rules and regulations, the breach of which will constitute a criminal act, is too well settled to be questioned. The power is expressly given under this section to the President to issue a proclamation and to say what, if anything, shall be prohibited from communication or publication, and this bill declares that whoever violates the prohibition shall be guilty of a crime and shall be punished.

But, after all, that point in and of itself, if everything else were satisfactory, is a minor matter, for it is easy for us to so change the language of this act so that it would meet the objections made by gentlemen who have criticized it. Hence we need spend no time touching that feature in relation to this section.

The word "communicating" there, as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] said, does present some difficulties that might lead to action which you would not wish to have taken, or create criminal liability not intended to be within the contemplation of this law.

The words "in his judgment," in line 7, of page 26, are also highly important words. The President may declare by proclamation what "in his judgment" is of such a character that it might be useful to the enemy.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the gentleman at that point?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I would rather you would not just for a moment.

That brings us to consider what it would be necessary to prove if one were to proceed to convict a prisoner accused of a violation of this section.

The first step would be the proclamation of the President, and the second to establish what the thing is that has been prohibited, and the third would be to establish the publication of that thing in the press, and your case is complete. Leaving "in his judgment" remain would foreclose the question whether or not the thing prohibited "might be useful to the enemy." The jury could not consider that, for the decision of the President would be final.

You will notice by this recital of the steps leading to conviction and the words "in his judgment" remaining in the statute would take out of the jury trial the offer of proof upon the fact as to whether or not the thing communicated or published in violation of the President's proclamation "is useful to the enemy." Perhaps if the words "in his judgment" were stricken out it might leave the question to be determined by the jury whether or not the thing published after being prohibited was a thing that was useful to the enemy. But we have attached a proviso to this paragraph which calls for consideration. The proviso is an effort to make the section entirely consonant with the demands of the Constitution, namely, nothing in this section shall be taken to abridge the right of criticism, discussion, and comment. I do not quote the words literally, but the substance of them. The thought that prevails, in my judgment, with respect to that provision, is this: Does not that provision, when given its full and complete force and effect, destroy the first part of the section? I do not know how the discussion can be carried on or the criticism successfully made unless the subject of the criticism be disclosed and enter into the discussion. That would seem to involve revealing the thing prohibited.

A great deal has been said about the newspaper press being higher and greater than the law. That is aside from the question that we are to consider. Something has been said here about what newspaper editorials have expressed upon this subject. That is not to be considered by us. We ought to take into account only the existing conditions in this state of war, to ascertain what evils ought to be corrected by legislation, and then proceed to correct them. On the other hand, the appeal of the Constitution must come up to every one of us, and I would rather a thousand times err on the side of avoiding the making of legislation at all than to err on the side of inflicting a limitation upon the freedom of speech and the freedom of the press, both of which are so essentially necessary to the welfare of my country.

There are a number of other things that must be discussed, that ought to be discussed, which should not be left to the judgment of any one man or set of men as to whether or not they should be prohibited.

The suggestions that have been made on this floor as to the treatment of soldiers, how they are fed, clothed, and handled, the policy under which the war is being conducted, and a hundred subjects that would spring to our minds that ought not to be prohibited but that ought to be freely discussed for the welfare of the country, are subjects of national importance whose discussion ought not to be left to any one man or any set of men; and it is better to meet whatever evil may ensue from the discussion of them than to throttle the discussion and prevent the airing of evils that exist which will make against the welfare of the country and its success in the war. My own mind has reached the conclusion with respect to this section, and I give notice now, Mr. Speaker, that it is my intention to move to strike out of this bill section 4 [applause] and to leave the bill in all of its other provisions, with whatever slight amendments your wisdom may think ought to be made to them, to stand as the act of this House.

I believe at this time that more evil will ensue from the enactment of section 4 than any possible good that may come by reason of it being written into this law. [Applause.] I have tried to show the difficulties that surround its enactment. I appreciate what our distinguished chairman has said with reference to the work of the committee in endeavoring to frame language that would meet the situation. This bill originally is not the work of a Member of this House, but it came to us as an appeal practically from a coordinate branch of the Government for aid in legislation to enable them to meet and successfully deal with the evils that have been shown to exist. That appeal ought to meet with a generous response at our hands, and it was in the endeavor to meet the appeal and provide law for treating every part of the difficulty that this bill in its entirety was framed.

Those who compare them will see that the language of this section and the section in the Senate bill have the same difficulty. If there is no language in this bill denouncing the crime, neither is there in the Senate bill, which says that the President may prescribe regulations; no proclamation goes forth, but he may prescribe regulations, and whoever violates those regulations covering any of the enumerated matters included in the senatorial bill would be guilty of a crime.

Some one has suggested that we attempt to enumerate in this section the things that are forbidden, confining it and restricting it to those which are nominated in the law; but any man who reflects must concede that it would be impossible to thoroughly enumerate all the subjects; that if we begin to enumerate they should be set forth and included in the language of this section. Hence it is, facing these difficulties, facing these uncertainties, facing the question of possibly interfering with the right of free speech and a free press, that I am going to ask, so far as my voice and reasoning may have influence, that the Members of this House join me in eliminating section 4 from this proposed measure.

I do not wish to go over all the sections in their order, but I think even a casual reading will give to the reader a conception of language intended to meet and correct conditions and evils that do exist and are not fancied but real. The next title is that which relates to vessels in port. Surely this is necessary.

Mr. BATHRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. BATHRICK. Before the gentleman leaves section 4 I would like to ask him does he think that any information relating to national defense that might be useful to the enemy should be published?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I do not.

Mr. BATHRICK. If you strike out this section, everybody will have a right to publish that, will they not?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. They have the right to-day.

Mr. BATHRICK. I understand that; but the law is for the purpose of prohibiting the right of anyone to communicate information to the enemy that might injure the country.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I think anybody who does it with a guilty purpose can be caught and dealt with under the preceding sections of the bill, and anybody who merely publishes matters here at home and does it in the discharge of what seems to him to be a duty by way of criticism ought not to be prosecuted nor punished under any portion of the bill.

I wish to state, in partial answer to this question, something that came to my knowledge with relation to the conduct of the press at this time.

A matter of really serious importance became known to some of the staff gathering information for publication. Upon the request of the head of a department of Government, no publication of that fact was made, although practically every newspaper in New York, Philadelphia, and Washington knew of the instance.

Another thing: When the St. Louis went out as the first armed merchantman, you can recall that there was not a line in any paper telling of her departure. Although she was saluted as she passed down into New York Bay by the craft that were in the harbor, there was not a line to tell the world that she had started on her perilous voyage across the sea. I am told that in many other respects—yes; in every respect—the press of the country has been rendering loyal service in observing the requests made to it with respect to publishing things that were deemed inadvisable.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman is quite right in stating that the press has put a patriotic censorship on itself. I would like to hear the gentleman discuss the difference between a censorship, so called, which would prevent by black brushing out certain articles that appear from day to day, and this general proclamation of the President by which a man will know in advance that if he publishes certain information he will be committing a crime. Which would be the more onerous on the press and the more inconvenient to the public?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. The censorship would be more onerous on the press than this law, because this law requires the President to issue a proclamation and say that A B is prohibited, and the papers would thus know and understand that A B is prohibited because it might be of service to the enemy. And if the provision is violated, the newspaper must answer for that specific thing, of which it had due notice. But a bad President could forbid matter so as to prevent our people from learning things which they should know.

When you create a censorship of the press you authorize the blue pencil to regulate and control the publications in newspapers, which is a decided innovation and would be an infringement of the rights and the freedom of the press and a most un-American institution.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman and I agree on that—that the censorship would be much more onerous and burdensome than this law; but has it not become necessary abroad to exercise the censorship during a period of this war?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I can not answer that, because I do not know exactly what the conditions abroad are. I know this, however, that the censorship abroad has been the subject of severe criticism, and the public unrest to-day is demanding fuller disclosures of everything, and the Government will be obliged to yield to that demand, for no man or set of men can mantain a position in the face of a united and earnest demand of the people of the country.

Mr. McCORMICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. McCORMICK. Before the gentleman concludes—because I know the House will be glad to have the benefit of his judgment—will he not speak of the possibility of enumerating the subjects of publication which might be forbidden. The gentleman has considered that question, I know, and his judgment will carry weight with the House. I think I disagree with him.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I thought of two ways by which the objections to this paragraph might be removed. My colleague on the committee, Mr. VOLSTEAD, suggested that probably the striking out of the words "in his judgment," in the seventh line, would work a result that would make it acceptable. The striking out of those words would not give a remedy, but would destroy the strength of the paragraph by leaving to the jury to determine whether the fact prohibited would, if published, be "useful to the enemy."

The two ways that occurred to me, however, were these: First, to write into this section the question of intent and knowledge. Beginning in the eighth line, by striking out the word "violates," after the word "whoever," and inserting the words "with intent or knowledge or reason to believe" that the publishing or attempt to publish or communicate or attempt to communicate the forbidden or prohibited things relating to the national defense would be not only in the proclamation but would be useful to the enemy. This would make the finding of the intent to give out information that might be useful to the enemy.

The difficulty is apparent to anybody, for that would relegate the whole question to a jury, the jury would determine every fact in connection with it, and the probabilities are that except in some extreme case that would inflame the public mind and drive men away from a cool, calm, deliberate judgment; you would never secure a conviction in a case of the violation of the prohibition.

In consequence an attempt to enumerate the things to which the right of publication would be restricted would be difficult. But I confess that I could not frame language that would satisfactorily enumerate to my mind the things that should properly be the subject placed within the power of the President to be included in any proclamation of prohibition. As I said a few moments ago, in view of these difficulties I feel that you can afford to strike that section from the bill without harming the bill, and we will be able to manage our affairs through the voluntary aid and help of the press, which has already been loyally offered, and without suffering serious injury to our country or her cause.

The next provision is new and relates to "injuring vessels." Everyone can understand why a provision of that kind is necessary. We have had object lessons to teach us.

Title IV relates to "interference with foreign commerce by violent means." There may be a question involved in this title as to how far we are intruding upon the domain of State legislation; but it was thought by the committee that so long as the section was restricted to those things which entered into foreign commerce and any effort to hinder or impede that commerce by destroying plants and works it would be a proper subject for Federal legislation.

The next title, V, relates to the enforcement of neutrality, and I am sure that when you read the sections under this title you will agree that there is nothing therein that is severe or drastic or improper.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there in connection with Title IV?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman explain the necessity for the National Government taking jurisdiction over matters which are entirely of local concern, and which the State jurisdictions can amply take charge of?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. But they are not entirely local. If what is embodied in the gentleman's questions were true—that the States could deal with these subjects successfully—it might be that this section would be wrong; but, unhappily, it is not the case. What we want to get at is those efforts to interfere by violence with the exercise of rights that belong to the American citizen in respect to foreign commerce that can be legitimately carried on during a time of war. You can best check and hinder these attacks by the aid of the Federal power. By the aid of the Secret Service branch of the General Government you can better succeed in locating and pursuing—often from State to State, where the State authorities would be limited by the State lines and be unable to do effective work—the malefactors of violence. I said, in speaking of this paragraph, that it approaches the border line of what ought to be or ought not to be in Federal legislation; but in view of its affecting the continuance and freedom of foreign commerce we thought that in order to meet difficulties on the part of States in enforcing it separately, we ought to make a provision by which the Federal power, with all of its resources and all of its strength, should pursue those who seek to violate the law and attempt to destroy property for their own malicious purposes in seeking to interfere with the exercise of legal rights on the part of American citizens.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is there anything to interfere with the National Government, throught its officers, pursuing the same activities the gentleman has so eloquently spoken of without this authority being vested in the National Government?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I think there is. I think this provision is necessary to clothe the Federal authorities with full scope and power to prevent the mischief that the section is aimed to correct.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, I grant you, it confers authority to prosecute those crimes in the courts of the United States, but they are still crimes under State law and the national officials can ferret them out with the same authority as under this provision.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I have answered as fully as I can the question of the gentleman, and I shall proceed to finish the remarks I have to make. The next section relates to the "enforcement of neutrality," and needs no comment. The next relates to the "seizure of arms," about which there is some difficulty in existing law and this section is intended to enlarge the power and give the Government control over this subject.

The next three titles relate to "disturbance of foreign relations" and interfering in the matter of "passports," forging, and so forth.

Title IX relates to the counterfeiting of the Government seal, which ought to be carefully guarded, especially in connection with passports and any public document that might be used to interfere with our neutral relations with other countries.

Title X relates to search warrants, and with respect to that title I have a suggestion to make, that there ought to be inserted into this section a provision which would limit the search warrant provided for herein "to the enforcement of any of the matters defined in preceding sections." The Department of Justice indulges altogether too much in the idea of search and seizure to be consonant with the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, and I would ask to have this right conferred by section 10 limited to the enforcement of the matters legislated upon in the preceding sections.

The use of the mails, Title XI, speaks for itself, and then follow several "general provisions" which help to explain the language of the bill.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will not the gentleman explain Title XI? Is not that covered by existing postal regulations and laws now?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I would rather have some other member of the committee answer that question than undertake to answer it myself, because I have not in connection with the article examined the existing laws upon that subject, and I do not wish to make a statement that I have not fully verified.

Mr. WEBB. I can say to my friend I do not think there is any law now prohibiting the mailing of such matter as under the section. That is why we wrote it in there.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. That is my impression.

Now, I wish to say in conclusion, a great deal has been published and spoken with reference to this act. We have scarcely considered a more important matter than this since the declaration of war, and if we eliminate section 4 of Title I, I am sure that we ought all to unite heartily and cordially in passing this measure and giving the benefit of its provisions to the administrative or executive department of our Government. We have all said we want to uphold the hands of the President, we want to uphold the hands of the Department of Justice, we want to uphold those who are charged with the execution of the laws and the maintenance of peace and order in our own midst, and we can do this best by the enactment into law of this proposed bill which the Judiciary Committee of the House has submitted for your consideration. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. May I ask how much time the gentleman from Minnesota has left and how much I have left?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota has 35 minutes and the gentleman from North Carolina has 38.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD], a member of the committee.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill which has for its completed purpose prosecution in the civil courts of criminal actions. Sometimes the discussion may have gone far afield or suggestions may have been made that it possibly incorporates military law, but those suggestions are not well taken. It is the purpose of and the practice under this bill to preserve the Criminal Code, to make certain cases arising under that code triable in civil courts, triable before a jury, before a judge who instructs the jury as to the law, so that in so far as anything offensive to American ideals of justice is concerned this bill contains nothing. Upon the other hand it seeks to include matters which are not at present covered in existing law for one great purpose, and that is the protection of the United States of America. The bill in its very first provision contains that which is the gist of the entire bill when it speaks under the title of espionage of information "to be used for the injury of the United States." Now, this is the controlling feature in the entire bill, something to be used to the injury of the United States.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I will yield. I should have preferred to wait until I made further progress in my remarks, but I will yield.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not think that should be confined to the military injury of the United States, not merely commercial or financial injury?

Mr. GARD. I think the purpose of the bill is that it is a military injury to the United States; it is an injury to American arms; it is any attempt to bring about anything which may be useful to an enemy, and since the bill carries that in its different provisions, clearly and manifestly the intent of the bill is to promote the success of American arms and prevent useful information being carried to an enemy. The bill has been discussed, properly discussed, under two heads, one head affecting the constitutional right, the other head being the question of expediency or of propriety, if one may use that term. Article I of the amendment to the Constitution provides "that Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press." The freedom of speech and the freedom of the press stand upon the same basis of constitutional right. They derive their authority from the same article. One is as great as the other. However, this article of the amendment must be construed in the words of the Constitution coming before that, and I refer to section 8 of Article I, which provides that "Congress may make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces," and that it may "make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof.

It is the idea, as expressed in the Constitution, that every law for its proper operation is necessary to be clothed in the flesh and blood of power. Therefore, constitutional authority is expressly given to the Congress to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces and to make all laws necessary for the purpose of carrying into execution all the powers in the Constitution contained. The authority to protect and defend the Government in time of war transcends all other authority.

Now, some gentlemen have contended here on the floor that this law is not constitutional, or perhaps one section of the law is not constitutional, namely, section 4. Before I come to that I may say, as other gentlemen have said, that there can be little genuine or well-taken objection made to the language of any part of this bill except where one considers section 4 as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] has considered it, not from a constitutional standpoint, not from a legal standpoint since he was frank enough to give his approval to its legality, but from the standpoint of practical difficulty. I take it that the sections in the bill regulating actual espionage and regulating the different elements of neutrality are all provisions which are absolutey necessary at this time to be incorporated in the law of the land. I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania that in this particular section 4 it comes within the rule laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States in the cases cited by those who have spoken before me, and with special reference to the citations in the Grimaud case, as appearing on page 506 and following, in Volume 220 of the United States Reports. So that the only thing after that to which our attention is brought as affecting the constitutionality of section 4 is that there has been no language defining what the prohibition is.

I myself find no fault with that, since I deem it to be necessarily included in the language used in the bill that the prohibition contained is legal and in a statutory way made. But if there be any doubt in the mind of anyone in this House that such legal prohibition is not made, I would suggest, as I have suggested to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, that possibly language similar to this might be employed, and I offer it merely as a suggestion:

That during any national emergency resulting from a war to which the United States is a party or from threat of such a war, the publishing or communicating or the attempt to publish or communicate any information relating to the national defense that is or might be useful to the enemy is hereby prohibited.

Then, following the language used in section 4 of this bill, which provides that the President may issue his proclamation after this law has first established a prohibitory feature therefor. But I speak of that as covering the possible defect which some gentlemen have imagined to exist in the law. For myself I do not believe it to exist and do not therefore especially urge it.

Now, we come to consider what section 4 is, and around that section has waged the entire contention this afternoon. It has been asserted that there are practical difficulties, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] has asked the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] to give the House the benefit of his valued opinion upon the question of incorporating in the bill a number of things which the Senate bill carries. The Senate bill enumerates a number of items, and then follows in language which is practically similar to the language used in the House bill. The Senate bill provides that there "shall be a proclamation and promulgation thereof with respect to the publishing of any information concerning the movements, numbers, description, condition, or disposition of any of the armed forces, ships, aircraft, or war material of the United States, or with respect to the plans or conduct of any naval or military operation, or with respect to any works or measures undertaken for or connected with or intended for the fortification or defense of any place, or any other information relating to the public defense."

The difference between that and the House bill is that the House bill makes of general character the publication of anything relating to the national defense which may be useful to the enemy.

The phase of intent is incorporated in this bill, because when you use the language "useful to the enemy" thereby is created the element of intent which makes the violation of this particular law an offense against this country, against these United States, for to furnish information useful to the enemy is herein denominated an offense against the United States, and one so furnishing such information can not but have evil intent.

Again I find myself in agreement with the gentleman from Pennsylvania that it is both unnecessary and possibly improper to set out the different things which are intended to be prohibited, since there is only one thing intended to be prohibited, and that is the information of character useful to the enemy. When we consider this bill as we are now discussing it, limited to the practical difficulties of its observance, I would say that I find no fault, and have found no fault, with the attitude of those who control the press of our country. I believe that the editors and the owners of the newspapers of the United States of America are among our most loyal citizens, and that they would do everything to advance the interests of the United States and nothing at all to interfere with their success. But when we assume that to be true, and emphatically it is true, we must realize as a practical matter of fact that there may exist—unfortunately there may exist—in our country either newspapers or newspaper men who are not guided by the high ideals of which I have spoken and of which I know almost universally newspapers and newspaper men are guided. And, like every other criminal statute—and this is a criminal statute—it is not intended as a punishment or deterrent for the great majority of the people, but it is intended for the protection of the majority of the people against the criminal, against the man who willfully and purposely would give aid and useful information to the enemy. So in that sense—and that is the only sense in which it can be properly considered—I do not think it presents any practical difficulty to the newspapers of the United States. On the contrary, it seemed to me that the newspapers would welcome a law of this kind. They can say, as they have already said, "We stand behind the Commander in Chief of our Army and naval forces; we are ready at any time to curtail our news items so that there may be no possibility of any information creeping therefrom which might be useful to the enemy."

All of the great newspapers of our country have done this, and from the great newspapers and the press associations of the country the news is flashed out all over the country, from north to south and from east to west, into the smaller daily papers and weeklies and bi-weekly papers, which, after all, make public opinion and which in times past have made and today are making the best public opinion. So that when I say that I advocate the continuance of this section I do it because I think it is for the protection of the good newspapers of the United States. And I am happy to say that those are very greatly in the majority among all our newspapers. I am of those who would rather bear in silence the sting of unjust criticism than sanction an abridgment of freedom of speech or of the press.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, may I have five minutes more?

Mr. WEBB. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. GARD. And in the matter of "practical difficulties" I desire to read to the House a proposition that has been made, because certain gentlemen, notably from the city of New York, have professed to find reasons for alarm in this bill. One of the gentlemen was so frank as to say that he did not believe in anything that would prohibit the press from publishing anything at all, no matter what it might be.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. GARD. You are the gentleman I referred to, and of course I yield.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In all fairness, why do you not quote what I said in addition to that? I added, "if it infringed upon the rights now guaranteed by the Constitution."

Mr. GARD. There is no intention in this bill to infringe on the rights guaranteed by the Constitution. But I was about to read that which was said by the metropolitan press, entitled "A tentative censorship bill agreed upon by New York newspapers." Now, this is concerning a tentative censorship bill. I do not believe in a censorship. I think the time is not here, and I hope it never will be here, when the press of the United States shall have a public censorship. But there may be for the protection of the press itself a necessity of indicating to the newspapers all over the land what is information which the Commander in Chief of our forces or the Government does not want to be broadly distributed. I read from this tentative censorship bill:

When a state of war exists the President may prohibit the use of the mails, the cables, the telegraphs for the purpose of transmitting to any foreign country information that may be of value to the enemies of the United States, and that he may issue such regulations as may be necessary to render such prohibition effective.

SEC. 2. That when a state of war exists the President may prohibit the publication of information within the United States, continental or insular, of any or all information, facts, rumors, or speculations relating to the armed forces of the Government, materials or implements of war, and that as to daily newspapers the regulations prescribed by the President shall be administered by a central board of censors to be appointed by the President.

Now, this is in the face of that which the gentleman from Pennsylvania says are the practical difficulties of enforcing this law. Here is a statement by the New York newspapers, delivered to the Senate of the United States, in which they themselves agree to a central board of censorship, to be appointed by the President, which shall administer the regulations prescribed by the President.

I believe that in this matter those of us present here who see the difficulties of administration are really fighting ghosts. We think we see something which does not, in fact, exist; and I refer to the very high authority of the New York Sun, which published an article 8 or 10 days ago, an article which I think is enlightening, and with which I shall close my remarks. It is headed, "Our liberties are not in danger," and reads as follows:

OUR LIBERTIES ARE NOT IN DANGER.

The Sun does not share the honest fears of some citizens that Congress is liable to put too much power in the executive department of the Government for the prosecution of war. The Sun refuses to be deceived by those who pretend alarm to cover their hostility to American purpose.

We are under no delusion as to the importance of the struggle in which the United States has entered. In it we shall be successful, but we shall not achieve success without undergoing inconvenience, deprivation, even hardship. We shall be obliged to conform our habits to the necessities of the Nation. We must relinquish privileges that in a long period of peace some have come to regard as inalienable rights. We shall be obliged to practice a repression foreign to our dispositions and incompatible with our easy political conventions. Sacrifices will be called for, will be imperative, and they will be made gladly by all patriots.

These sacrifices will involve no permanent impairment of our liberties. Instead, they will contribute to the defense of our freedom. For a time, long or short as the victory we are determined on is early or late, we shall be deprived of some of our familiar indulgences.

With that victory will come restoration of every privilege we now possess, unimpaired and buttressed in a power not hitherto known. Meanwhile our liberties are safeguarded in the Constitution, in the integrity of our officials, and beyond all in the steadfast, unquestioned devotion of the American people.

Mr. WEBB. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. WEBB. Is it not generally understood that the owner of the New York Sun is also the owner of the Evening Times of this city, from which we have just had read this article condemning the censorship bill?

Mr. GARD. I know nothing of the ownership of the newspapers mentioned.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The Sun article was published before the espionage bill was reported into the House or Senate, and it closes by saying that our rights are protected by the Constitution, and the first amendment protects a free press.

Mr. GARD. The bill seeks to protect a free press and to protect our country against the publication of prohibited matters relating to our national defense which might be useful to an enemy.

Mr. SMITH of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. If my time is not exhausted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has half a minute remaining.

Mr. GARD. I gladly yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SMITH of New York. I will ask the gentleman if he believes that the article which he has read from the Sun is an approval of section 4 in any sense?

Mr. GARD. I would say it was an entire approval of section 4.

Mr. SMITH of New York. I differ with my friend on that subject.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman believe, with that editorial, that those who are opposing section 4 are hostile to American purposes?

Mr. GARD. Oh, no; not at all. I make no such statement. I read the editorial. I think here it is all a matter of legitimate discussion in which we all should strive to do that which is best for our country.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WEBB. I will ask the gentleman from Minnesota if he desires to use any more of his time to-night?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Not to-night.

Mr. WEBB. Has the gentleman any more speakers who desire to use time?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes; but I have agreed to yield time to them later on.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 42 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, May 3, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, reports on preliminary examination and survey of Yaquina Bar, Bay, and Harbor, Oreg., including consideration of any proposition for cooperation of local interests (H. Doc. No. 109); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, reports on preliminary examination and survey of Taunton River, Mass., from its mouth to the head of navigation at Weir village, with a view of securing a channel of 25 feet depth, or of such depth as may be considered advisable in the interests of commerce (H. Doc. No. 110); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication of the Secretary of the Navy, submitting an additional estimate of appropriation required for salaries, office of Chief of Naval Operations, Navy Department, for the fiscal years 1917 and 1918 (H. Doc. No. 111); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. DILL: A bill (H. R. 4019) to punish the speculation by any person or body of persons for the purpose of cornering the market and providing a penalty therefor, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SCULLY: A bill (H. R. 4020) appropriating money for the improvement of the Shrewsbury River, N. J., up to Red Bank, on the North Branch, and to Branchport, on the South Branch; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. ESCH: A bill (H. R. 4021) to approve mutual cessions of territory by the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota and the consequent changes in the boundary line between said States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. JACOWAY: A bill (H. R. 4022) to increase the revenue; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, a bill (H. R. 4023) authorizing the President to requisition and operate railroads or steamboat lines whenever he deems it necessary for the national security and defense; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. CROSSER: A bill (H. R. 4024) to provide increased revenue by a direct tax on the value of land in the United States, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES], who is detained from the Senate by illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-one Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

CARE OF GERMAN PRISONERS.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, out of order I desire to introduce a joint resolution, and I ask that it be read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. OVERMAN. I shall not object to the introduction of the joint resolution. I understand that it is not to be considered but simply to be referred. However, to any matter that is called up and asked to be considered I shall object. I do not object to this.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 50) authorizing and empowering the President of the United States to make offer to the Governments of England and France to take over and care for German prisoners detained in those countries was read the first time by its title and the second time at length and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Senate joint resolution 50.

Whereas there are a great number of German prisoners of war in the detention camps in England and France who must now be cared for, fed, and supported by the Governments of these countries; and

Whereas it is the policy of this county in every way to assist the allied powers in the matter of food supplies; and

Whereas it will afford a considerable relief to these two countries if our Government takes over the care and support of these prisoners: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States be authorized and empowered to make offer to the Government of these two countries to take over these prisoners of war and that provision be made, if the said offer is accepted, to convey to this country as many of these prisoners as practicable, and that the President be further authorized and empowered to prepare camps for the detention of such prisoners as are brought to this country.

For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this resolution an appropriation of $1,000,000 is hereby made out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

RECEPTION OF BRITISH COMMISSIONERS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to make an announcement. When the British commissioners called on the presiding officer of the Senate, he invited them to appear on the floor of the Senate. It was not convenient on that occasion, and it has been delayed from time to time to suit the convenience of the commissioners. The Chair has just received notice that next Tuesday, May 8, at 12.30 p. m., will be a satisfactory time; and the Chair invited them to come and visit the Senate at that time.

ESTIMATE OF APPROPRIATION (S. DOC. NO. 14).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Comptroller of the Treasury submitting an urgent estimate of appropriation for additional force in his office, $31,940, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from Bishop Chartrand, of Indianapolis, Ind., praying that all ordained ministers of religion and all students for the ministry be exempted from military service, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the United Irish Societies of Paterson, N. J., pledging support to the President and praying for the freedom of Ireland, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Laymen's Missionary Movement of the Methodist Episcopal Church South in session in the city of Nashville, Tenn., favoring national prohibition during the period of the war, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the memorial of Dudley M. Shively, of South Bend, Ind., and a memorial of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Corporation of the Northwest, remonstrating against the proposed tax on the gross receipts of moving-picture theaters, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented a petition of sundry citizens of Greenville, Tex., praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PHELAN presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from the president and faculty of the Leland Stanford Junior University, Palo Alto, Cal., praying for national prohibition during the period of the war, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the Bonner Fruit Co., of Lankershim, Cal., praying for the placing of an embargo on tin plate, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NELSON presented a resolution adopted by the Douglas County Maximum Crops Association of Minnesota, praying for the establishment of maximum and minimum prices on food products, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. GALLINGER presented the memorial of Dana W. Baker, of Exeter, N. H., remonstrating against an increase of postage on first-class mail matter, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented petitions of the congregations of the Congregational Church of Barrington, N. H., and of the Baptist Church of East Washington, N. H., praying for national prohibition during the period of the war, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

A bill (S. 2140) making available appropriations in the Indian appropriation act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, for the Ganado irrigation project, Arizona, for repair of flood damages, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. GORE:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 51) to authorize the Committee on Indian Affairs of the House of Representatives to continue the investigation of the Indian Service; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PUNISHMENT OF ESPIONAGE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2) to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I wish to say simply a word about the matter suggested yesterday by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD]. I am not acquainted with the details of the canning business, but I know we have some very large canning concerns in our State especially engaged in the canning of fish, and I have received a great many telegrams from these organizations urging the enactment of legislation of this character. They are especially interested in having tin plate out of which the cans are made. They seem to fear that unless an embargo is placed upon the exportation of tin plate they will not be able to get sufficient plate to make the cans necessary to conserve the product which their industry is engaged in canning.

While I do not want to encourage any hysteria throughout the country, I feel that one of the essential things for us to do in the war is to conserve our food supply and to make it just as abundant as possible. I have no fear of famine in this country; but, Mr. President, we have not only to feed our own people but we are going to have to feed those with whom we are fighting. We are going to have to feed the people of France, England, and Italy in addition to our own.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the amendment now pending submitted by the Senator from Georgia prevails, it is limited so that the President can not take care of that situation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I know that. In view of the fact which I have just stated it seems to me that every step we can take, not only to encourage an increase in the production of food in this country but also to encourage the ways and means by which it may be taken care of and preserved for use, should be adopted, and should have the consideration of Congress, and its consideration just as quickly as possible. There are many food products which can be made available if there are cans in which to put them which will not be made available in any other way. Corn can be made available in that way for food purposes as it might not be in any other way. Peas, beans, fruit, and many of the various things that we consume in daily life can be more largely conserved if they can be canned and kept for an indefinite period of time and made available when they are really needed.

As I said, we have some large canning industries in our State that are canning fish, and they are shipping it to all parts of the world. The people who are engaged in that industry fear that they will not be able to have the cans to take care of the fish which might be caught and conserved if they were assured of an ample supply of containers. I do not know whether there is any danger in that regard or not, but it does seem to me that Congress ought to take whatever steps may be necessary to safeguard and make absolutely sure that such a condition of things will not come about, not for the special interest of the canners or to promote their business but for the safety of our own people and for the safety of those who are fighting our common enemy. An ample supply of food for them and for ourselves is absolutely necessary for victory in this war. A supply of food is just as essential as men and armies.

As the Senator from North Carolina suggested, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia, as I understand it, affects only those food products that are shipped to neutral countries and are likely to go to our enemies. That is good as far as it goes, but it does not go far enough.

Mr. PAGE. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. PAGE. The remarks of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] some 10 days ago upon this matter were the subject of some consideration before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry the other day, and Secretary Houston was especially interrogated to know if in his judgment there was danger along the line suggested by the Senator from Maine. Secretary Houston said he thought that danger was overestimated, and that he had recently taken up the matter with the manufacturers of steel and tin plate and had been assured that they were making preparation to take care of the necessary wants of the canning industry. I have great faith in the information given by the Senator from Maine, for I think he is quite as conversant with the facts, perhaps, as the Secretary of Agriculture, but I am sure the Secretary has this in mind, and that it is his determination to see that the canning industry is supplied if possible.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, this is the 3d day of May, and on the 27th day of April, just about a week ago, Secretary Houston wrote as follows to the Senator from Maine:

THE SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, April 27, 1917.

Hon. BERT M. FERNALD,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have your letter of April 26, in which you ask my views on Senate bill No. 1867, introduced by you, giving the President authority to direct exports from this country. I am heartily in favor of the bill. I was coming to the committee meeting Tuesday morning to give my personal indorsement of the bill, but was prevented from appearing by reason of very important developments here. I greatly hope the bill will pass promptly.

Very sincerely,

D. F. HOUSTON, Secretary.

If the Secretary was in favor of the bill, he must have deemed that it was important to have it passed, or in a way necessary.

Mr. PAGE. I think perhaps the letter from the Senator from Maine to the Secretary grew out of the fact that after the Secretary made this statement before the committee I went to the Senator from Maine and said to him that there was a conflict of opinion, and the Senator from Maine assured me that he had investigated the matter and was satisfied that there was danger. I think thereupon he wrote to the Secretary and the Secretary rather acceded to his view and approved of his bill. I simply mention that because I want the Senator from Washington and the Senate to know that the matter is one which the department have in mind and are determined to safeguard if possible.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Unless we give them this legislation they may find themselves confronted with a situation where they can not take care of it.

Mr. PAGE. I think they have the necessary power.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Why, then, did he not say so in this letter?

Mr. PAGE. He is quite willing that legislation should be had.

Mr. JONES of Washington. He is entirely willing and heartily in favor of it. I would like to ask the Senator whether that letter was written before or after the hearing?

Mr. PAGE. After the hearing, I think.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I gather from the letter that he appeared before the committee after he wrote the letter.

Mr. PAGE. I can not believe that.

Mr. GRONNA. What is the date of the letter?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is dated April 27.

Mr. GRONNA. The date of the hearing was April 23.

Mr. FERNALD. I wrote the Secretary on the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont, because I thought the information that I gathered was contrary to what the Secretary had told me over the phone, and the letter was written subsequent to that.

I want to say further, if I am permited this morning, within an hour information has come to me that every cannery of food in this country to-day is shut down now on account of the lack of cans, so that the suggestion from the Secretary that this might be relieved immediately has proven to be a failure. I will have that information in writing, I think, by 3 o'clock this afternoon. There are hundreds of products that ought to be canned now, and the canneries are at this minute closed down.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That situation just illustrates the danger of leaving the matter without legislative power being vested in the proper authorities to act in any emergency that may come up that they can not foresee.

Mr. PAGE. The Senator knows I am heartily in favor of this legislation.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Minn.?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do.

Mr. NELSON. The Secretary of Agriculture will have no power to do what the Senator from Maine desires; he will have no legal power to enforce it without the enactment of this section. This section gives him general power, and under this enactment he will have the necessary power, but without it he has no power at all.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The fact called out by the Senator from Maine just now that the canning industries are practically at a standstill on account of a lack of tinplate illustrates the danger, as I said, of relying entirely upon the opinion some departmental officer may have. There is no question but that the Secretary of Agriculture was perfectly sincere in suggesting to the committee that the situation would be met, and yet within four days afterwards he writes to the Senator from Maine that he is in favor of this bill, which looks toward giving the President the power to prevent these exportations. The reason why I thought that this letter was written before the hearing was because he says:

I was coming to the committee meeting Tuesday morning to give my personal indorsement of the bill, but was prevented from appearing by reason of very important developments here.

So apparently he had changed his mind as to the necessity of this measure. Anyhow, if he led the committee to believe on the 23d or 24th that the legislation was not necessary, he says he was coming to the committee to give the committee his indorsement of the measure.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I think the view of the Secretary of Agriculture was that the manufacturers of tin plate were quite patriotic, and of their own volition they would see to it that a change in this matter was effected without legislation; but that does not mean the legislation may not be wise, and I assume it is. I am in favor of it. I think, however, that the Secretary evidently believes that there is a feeling that——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I am anxious to hear what the Senator from Vermont is saying, but I can not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). The Senate will be in order.

Mr. PAGE. I say that I think the Secretary of Agriculture has received information from the manufacturers of tin plate to the effect that they would try to remedy this difficulty without being forced to do so by a congressional enactment; but the Secretary was unquestionably of the opinion that no harm could result from having this power conferred, and believing him, I am heartily in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Maine; but I do not know that we are more solicitous than we need be, in view of the fact that the manufacturers of steel and tin plate seem to be at this time very patriotic and design to do all that the Government could ask them to do without any enforcing legislation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, it does not seem to me that there is any impeachment of anybody's patriotism by suggesting legislation of this character. If these people are sending their tin-plate products to this consumer or to this purchaser or to that, I do not think that they are influenced by unpatriotic motives; but if a situation is developed through that action that is dangerous to the country, it ought to be met in some way either by direct action by Congress or by action under such a law as we propose here, vesting the President with power to take care of a situation that appears to him to be dangerous to the country.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. In justice to the Secretary of Agriculture I think I ought to read from the hearings what the Secretary of Agriculture actually said upon this very question:

Senator SMITH of Georgia. We are being asked now to legislate to forbid the exportation of tin cans or the kind of containers that are used for canned vegetables and canned foods, upon the ground that unless we forbid the exportation there will be a terrific shortage and no supply can be had. You do not think the facts justify that?

Secretary HOUSTON. I think the bill giving the Government power to control exports should be passed. It might be desirable and necessary to exercise that power with reference to containers. We do not know now how rapidly the manufacturers will produce an ample supply. I think the Government ought to have power to deal with the situation as the emergency may require.

That is the testimony of Secretary Houston.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is very clear and is in entire accord with the letter which is in the RECORD.

Mr. President, it may not be necessary for the President to exercise this power; the situation may be fully taken care of by means of the ordinary methods of doing business; but it does seem to me in this crisis and in this emergency, when all possible or dangerous conditions that could be anticipated may in fact arise, that we ought to give to some agency of the Government whatever power is necessary to take care of any such emergency when it arises. If the emergency does not arise we have no right to assume or to believe that the power will be exercised. So it seems to me that we ought to vest in the Executive—and that it would be very wise to do so—the power in this war emergency to take care not only of the exports of tin plate, though those are not mentioned in the provision, but of exports generally, to promote the safety of the country.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do.

Mr. FERNALD. In justice to myself and in order to prove that what I did say was absolutely correct, I want to read a little more from the hearing which was held on April 23—10 days ago—from page 10. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] made the inquiry:

May I ask you a question there, Mr. Secretary?—

Addressing Secretary Houston—

It has been reported that a great deal of the food products which it is necessary to can in order to preserve, that they will not be able to do it because of a lack of cans, and that a lot of the canneries will be idle——

Secretary HOUSTON. I do not think that is true, Senator.

That was on the 23d of April, and to-day I can show by absolute authority from the canneries that every cannery in the United States which is canning nonperishable vegetables and foods is closed down. So the Secretary was simply in error in his thought that the situation might be relieved.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. In corroboration of what the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] has said I wish to state that I have received a letter from a man whom I know very well and very favorably—Mr. W. H. Standish, who is now operating a cannery at Reeds Spring, Mo. Mr. Standish was at one time the attorney general of our State. There is no more honest or patriotic citizen living in this country than is Mr. Standish. I believe every word he says, and he stated in his letter to me that his factory was closed down because he could not get containers.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, one of the largest packers in the United States to-day has come on here—and he is now within the sound of my voice—to tell me that I have not made the picture half dark enough; that hundreds and thousands of canneries in this country, about which I did not know and which in my estimate I did not consider, had actually closed down. He is one of the largest packers of canned foods in the United States, and there is not a can in his factory to-day.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington permit me to ask a question of the Senator from Maine?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I desire to ask the Senator from Maine, who, of course, is thoroughly familiar with this particular subject, what sort of food products are being canned, we will say, in Missouri at this time?

Mr. FERNALD. I do not know what they are now canning in Missouri.

Mr. WADSWORTH. What would be canned in Missouri if the factory to which the Senator refers was open?

Mr. CURTIS. All kinds of vegetables which are raised in Missouri would be canned.

Mr. WADSWORTH. At this time of the year?

Mr. FERNALD. They could can kidney beans. Twenty-five varieties of beans are now being canned, and the organization of these canneries can be kept together where the canneries are located. They have to have superintendents and managers and bookkeepers and the whole organization, and they are kept together when they are packing nonperishable vegetables, like beans and fruits and spaghetti and many other different articles.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington allow me to ask the Senator from Maine a question?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. FERNALD. I presume that the Senator from Georgia or the Senator from Missouri could answer the question which has just been propounded by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]; but I am sure that at present large quantities of meats are being canned in Missouri.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to ask the Senator from Maine a question, which is a little different from the immediate answer to this question. If the only industry which is suffering is the industry that would use cans, why not now limit the inhibition to empty cans? If you can make a case as to that, and offer legislation as to that alone, I am ready to support you. What I am objecting to is passing out of the hands of Congress and giving to anybody else the indiscriminate right to stop the export of anything they please.

Mr. FERNALD. I want to say to the Senator from Georgia that, so far as my interest is concerned, all that I have reference to at this time is that the tin plate may be held in this country. I do not know what the sponsors of the bill seek.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. REED. Perhaps the Senator will indulge me.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly, I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I desire to ask the Senator from Maine what the total production of tin plate in the United States amounts to?

Mr. FERNALD. To about 20,000,000 boxes.

Mr. REED. Is that production limited by the lack of raw material?

Mr. FERNALD. No. The trouble is that we are shipping plates abroad which, if they could be held in this country for a very short time, would give us a surplus to go and come on, and make certain that the canners would have sufficient containers. This provision would not have to last any length of time, probably.

Mr. REED. I heard the Senator's statement as to the difficulty confronting the canner; that is, he needs cans and there is a lot of them being sent away. I am going back of that question. There is tin plate in this country, and I want to know whether the supply of tin plate is limited by a lack of raw material out of which to make it, or whether the supply is limited because of the incapacity of the factories to make it, or whether it is limited by both?

Mr. FERNALD. I think the supply is limited in this country because of the fact that we are exporting more now than we ought to.

Mr. REED. That does not limit the supply; that is a question of consumption.

Mr. FERNALD. Well, I think the tin-plate factories in this country could produce enough.

Mr. REED. Let me make it plain. If there is a sufficient amount of raw material accessible at reasonable prices to make all the tin plate we need in this country and all we need to ship abroad—if that is a fixed fact, then the only thing necessary to have all the tin plate we need to supply both markets is an increase of the manufacturing capacity, and that increased manufacturing capacity will certainly come if prices go high enough. So that I am interested in knowing now what it is that brings about a shortage of tin plate in this country—whether it is a shortage of raw materials out of which to make tin plate, or whether it is a deficiency in manufacturing capacity, or whether the demand abroad is simply a sharp demand that has suddenly arisen.

Mr. FERNALD. No, sir. We have been exporting great quantities of tin plate right along. I think there is plenty of raw material in the country. Let me say——

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

Mr. FERNALD. If the Senator will permit me, let me say, while I am on this question, that of course if prices of any product continue to increase so that it becomes a profitable business, business men will undertake its manufacture, but it takes two years at least to establish a tin-plate factory. It is one of the most expensive industries in the world to establish, and it takes a long time to equip such a factory.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. KNOX. I think I can perhaps answer the question of the Senator from Missouri. I was informed the other day by one of the leading manufacturers of the United States, to whom I put exactly the question the Senator from Missouri has put to the Senator from Maine, that the shortage of tin plate in this country is because of the fact that we can not get the tin. The base of tin plate is sheet steel, which then is tinned. The manufacturers largely depend upon imports of tin from Wales and other foreign countries; and that is the reason, as explained to me, for the shortage at this time.

Mr. REED. We can not get the tin?

Mr. KNOX. We can not get the tin.

Mr. REED. I am requested to ask at about what date that information was given to the Senator?

Mr. KNOX. It was given to me within 10 days.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator.

Mr. FERNALD. But, Mr. President, we are shipping about 50,000 boxes per month. We are exporting that quantity today. If it could be held in this country it would give us sufficient for the needs of the packers at this time.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield to me for a moment?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PAGE. Answering the question of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], I want to say that at our committee meeting the other day I asked the question as to where tin came from——

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator that he suspend until the conversation in the Chamber ceases. He is interfering with it.

Mr. PAGE. I repeat, as answering the question of the Senator from Missouri and as qualifying the answer of the Senator from Pennsylvania, that at our committee meeting the other day the question of tin for tinning the sheet-steel plates was brought up by myself, and I said:

> Mr. Secretary, there was a speech made in the Senate the other day in which the matter of tin was referred to. Is there an available supply of tin to meet this increase?
> Secretary HOUSTON. The getting of steel and other things is a part of the process of increasing that supply.
> Senator PAGE. We get the tin from Singapore, do we?
> Secretary HOUSTON. Mr. Brand can answer that.
> Mr. BRAND. We get it from the Straits Settlements; but there is an ample supply of tin. It only requires 1 pound of tin to coat 100 pounds of sheet steel.

That was the testimony of Mr. Brand, in response to the suggestion of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I understand that there is no difficulty about tin in the Straits Settlements. The difficulty about it, as explained to me by the manufacturer to whom I have referred, is in getting it here. We can not get it into this country. There is plenty at Singapore, lying in the ports, and plenty produced in the Straits Settlements, but on account of the scarcity of shipping facilities we are not able to get a sufficient quantity in this country to meet the demand.

Mr. PAGE. I can only give the Senator the information which has come to me.

One word more, and I will terminate my remarks. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], continuing the inquiry, a part of which has been read into the RECORD, said:

> Senator NORRIS. May I ask you a question there, Mr. Secretary? It has been reported that a great deal of the food products which it is necessary to can in order to preserve, that they will not be able to do it because of a lack of cans, and that a lot of the canneries will be idle——
> Secretary HOUSTON. I do not think that is true, Senator.
> Senator NORRIS (continuing). Because they can not get tin cans. Is there anything in that?
> Secretary HOUSTON. I think not now. There might have been; but a number of weeks ago this matter was brought to our attention. It was reported that the manufacturers of cans needed more steel and that they could not get the steel companies to supply or the cars to ship it. The Secretary of Commerce and I immediately took the matter up with the chairman of the committee on transportation of the Council of National Defense and with the manufacturers, and their cooperation was secured. The steel companies said they would supply the steel. The manufacturers of the cans said they would expedite their processes, and the canners were asked to make a point especially of canning things that were perishable rather than those that could be otherwise conserved, if necessary.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I appreciate the position of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. He does not desire to give such wide and tremendous power to any executive officer of the Government as is proposed to do by this provision. Generally, I am not in favor of anything of that kind either, but now we are at war and we have to do a great many things which we would not do in time of peace. I was opposed to getting into the war, but we are in it, and we ought to carry it on in the most effective way possible. So far as I am concerned, I am in favor of giving to the President, who has to carry on this war and conduct it with the means and instrumentalities that we give him, every power that we can give him within the limits of the Constitution, to carry it on effectively and expeditiously.

Now it appears that there is a crisis in one particular line of industry, threatening the maintenance of our food supply, coming about by reason of a deficiency in the supply of a particular product. Congress does not know——

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will yield to the Senator in just a moment—Congress does not know when an emergency of this character will arise in another line of industry. We can not tell. There is nobody who can determine that better than the Executive, who has the Agricultural Department and the various other departments to furnish him information and keep him in touch with the situation throughout the country. So, it seems to me, that the wise thing for us to do at this time is to give to the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, the Executive of the Government, all the power that may be required in the future in the conduct of this war that we can give him within the limits of the Constitution.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] who rose first.

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Very well.

Mr. GORE. I wish to ask the Senator from Washington if he thinks we can both stimulate an increase of production of foodstuffs and at the same time either threaten or enforce an embargo on the exploitation of foodstuffs?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I did not intend to discuss the merits of that proposition. I am willing to take the provisions of this bill and vest the President with the power to determine what he thinks is best for the safety of this country in this emergency as conditions may arise. I leave that to him. We can not determine here, at any rate at this time, what might be or might not be a wise or unwise course to take under certain conditions hereafter, which may be entirely different from what they are now.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator from Utah, who has been waiting to ask a question.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am very much interested in this proposition——

Mr. FERNALD. Will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. KING. Permit me to make this inquiry, and perhaps the Senator from Maine may aid the Senator from Washington in replying. I was about to say that I was very much interested in this matter, for the reason that in the State which I in part represent there are a large number of canning plants, and I have received many communications from them, depicting in rather dark colors the danger that menaces that industry because, as it is claimed, practically all of the tin plate of this country is being shipped to oriental countries. What I wanted to ask either the Senator from Washington or the Senator from Maine was whether or not the manufacturers of tin plate in this country were discriminating against the domestic purchasers and consumers in favor of the foreign consumers or why it was that the domestic consumers of tin plate could not obtain the amount requisite for the industry of this country?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I can not give the Senator the information he wishes along those lines. If the Senator from Maine can, I shall be very glad to yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, answering the Senator from Missouri, I spoke last week to this same bill, and I want to give him the exact figures, because I have them before me.

There are 12 tin-plate mills in this country, whose combined output, according to the census of 1914, is 2,084,536,669 pounds, requiring 20,845,366 boxes of tin plate. More than one-half of all the tin plate used in this country is used in manufacturing containers of food products. The export of tin plate last year was 5,200,000 boxes. Of these 1,300.000 boxes were shipped to Canada. Large shipments of tin plate are made to Asia, being used extensively in the oil business and for many other purposes, as is much of the plate used in this country. So it will be noted that about one-quarter of all the tin plate manufactured in this country was exported in 1914, and I think the exports have increased somewhat in the last two years.

Now as to the pig tin: Most—and I might say all—of the pig tin comes from Singapore, but the industry is controlled by the British Government, so that as to the 1,300,000 boxes which are shipped to Canada it would be necessary to keep on exporting that, because if we shut out Canada the British Government would naturally shut us off from the pig tin. But I understand that the only trouble in getting pig tin in this country is due to the fact that our boats are sometimes interfered with; and if a boat of ordinary size carrying a cargo of tin were torpedoed, it would shut down the tin business in this country, because we only use 1 pound of pig tin to 100 pounds of plates. Only 1 per cent of tin plate is pig tin.

I think I have given the Senator the exact information he desired.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator——

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

The VICE PRESIDENT. We seem to be having a "round table" this morning.

Mr. STERLING. I understand now that the tin plate is manufactured in this country. The Senator's complaint, as I understand, is that it is exported abroad?

Mr. FERNALD. Yes.

Mr. STERLING. Why do not the home consumers of tin plate secure it? Why do they not purchase it instead of its being sent abroad?

Mr. FERNALD. Why, that is a matter of commerce. I suppose these tin-plate manufacturers have contracts which were, perhaps, made a year ago that they are filling, and unless they are relieved by some legal method they will have to continue to keep their contracts, I assume.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, just a word and then I am through. I would have been through a good bit ago except for these interruptions.

I stated a while ago that I was willing to give the President all the power that might be necessary to meet this emergency within the limits of the Constitution. Now, I think there is some language in this bill that ought to be stricken out. It may be that amendments have been offered to strike it out—I do not know—but I merely wanted to suggest that, in line 22, I would strike out the words "at such time or times and from such place or places and," so that it would make it "unlawful to export any article or articles from the United States, except under such regulations and orders and subject to such limitations and exceptions," and so forth. The Constitution prohibits Congress from passing any law showing a preference between the ports of the country. Now, it seems to me that, so far as the language of this provision is concerned, we are attempting to authorize the President to do what the Constitution prohibits being done.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I do not think the Constitution applies, except as to the regulation of the matter by means of the tariff. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] has an amendment to cover what the Senator proposes, which I am willing to accept.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Very well. That was all I wanted to suggest about that. I do not remember exactly the language of the Constitution, but my recollection is that the effect of it is that we can not pass a law giving a preference in the matter of exportation to one city over another city.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. To the ports of one State over the ports of another State.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; to the ports of one State over the ports of another; and yet if the President, by regulation, can determine that exports can go from Baltimore but can not go from New York, it seems to me that that would be contrary to that provision of the Constitution. We ought not even by language to appear to attempt to confer that authority upon him. The matter of the time is not so important. The President will fix the time as to the beginning and ending of the embargo, whether we so provide or not.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, if there be a necessity for limiting the export of tin plate, why not confer upon the President the power to limit the export of tin plate? Why confer on him universal embargo power? Does not the Senator look upon that as an absolute abdication of the function of Congress?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Well, we are going to abdicate a whole lot of things during this emergency, and we will have to do it.

Mr. WATSON. I understand that, but the less the better. Why go into the business on a wholesale scale?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Just because of what I said awhile ago. We have the facts presented only with reference to the tin-plate industry, the canning industry. Apparently that is the one that is in a critical condition now; but we do not know what other industry will be affected in the same way next week or next month or when we get away from here.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of Washington. If we can give the President this power, and if it is desirable to give it to him in one line of industry it seems to me that it is the part of wisdom during this war to give him the power to meet any emergency that may confront him with reference to any line of industry.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; I am willing to yield the floor. If the Senator wants to ask me a question, I will endeavor to answer it.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will take the floor, but I should like to ask the Senator from Washington a question before he desists.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Very well.

Mr. SHIELDS. I agree with the Senator in being anxious to prosecute this war vigorously. I believe that nothing should be left undone and that all measures ought to be put in force and prosecuted that will effect that end; but why not have Congress remain here and discharge its functions as these emergencies occur instead of abdicating them and leaving them to some other branch of the Government to discharge?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing to stay here all the summer. I am perfectly willing to stay here as long as it is necessary to discharge any duty or responsibility that is upon Congress; and if that is deemed to be the best way to meet these emergencies when they come up, very well. But we are going to reach a point probably when there will appear to be nothing for Congress to do. We are going to give the President a whole lot of power in a great many different lines, and we are going to give him power in lines that are likely to be far more injurious to this country than along these lines if there is any injury to come from it. But the time is coming when we will think that our work is done, when the President will have no further recommendations to make to us, and we are going to get away; or is it the Senator's idea that we ought to stay here waiting for something to come up, waiting for some condition to arise that will require the exercise of legislative power?

We may get through, and we might provide for the tin-plate industry and take care of that, and we might pass whatever appropriation bills are necessary and get through with the work that apparently it is necessary for Congress to do, and adjourn; and within a week conditions might arise with reference to some particular line of industry or activity that would require the exercise of large power by somebody. Of course, in that event Congress could be called back, but that takes time. Then legislation could be prepared and we could discuss it as long as we needed to; and unless we would expect to go into the details of the matter we would come back here to do the will of the Executive as to what he deemed necessary in the emergency, and we would do it without any special information or investigation. We would grant him the power asked. It is true we would go through the forms of acting, but in effect it would be just what we are proposing to do here. The advantage in this method is that it will secure prompt action. To wait for Congress to act in each particular emergency is to invite delay and disaster.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the wise thing for us to do is to say to the President: "Within the limits of the Constitution we are willing to trust you, during this summer and while this war is being carried on, to do along these lines what is necessary to be done, and to do it promptly and energetically." Why, oftentimes in matters of this kind time is of the essence of successful results. Time and promptness are obsolutely necessary to the successful development and prosecution of whatever must be done in connection with war; and so it seems to me that it is wise to give the general power proposed to be given by this provision to the President of the United States, and I am willing to give it to him. I am willing to stay here all summer, so far as that is concerned, and glad to do it if that is necessary and best.

I have opposed in the past the shirking of responsibilities by Congress. I am not in favor of doing it as long as there is time and opportunity for Congress to act, and when it is best for us to act. I have been denounced at home and other places because I was willing to assume the responsibilities that I thought were resting upon me and discharging duties that it was my duty to discharge, and which I was willing to discharge, instead of trying to shirk them and thrust them upon the President of the United States. But now the duty and the responsibility of carrying on this war to a successful conclusion really rest primarily upon him, and I am willing and I propose, so far as I can do so, to give him every power within the limits of the Constitution that is necessary for him to discharge that responsibility successfully and to bring this war to a conclusion. I am willing to give him, as I said, every power and authority that is necessary, and I do not believe I am shirking responsibility when I do it. I believe in so doing I am helping him and upholding his hands in bringing this country through this war to its successful termination, and of course I know that the Senator from Tennessee is in favor of the same thing. In what I have said I do not desire to be understood as reflecting upon him in the slightest degree, nor upon any other Senator.

Mr. WATSON and other Senators addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This round table must stop from now on.

Mr. SHIELDS. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Well, Mr. President, I suggest to the Chair that——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington is not out of order; but three Senators aside from the Senator from Washington, who was in order and speaking by leave of the Senator from Tennessee, began to talk at once.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I was ready to yield the floor. If the Senator desires to ask me a question, I shall be glad to have him do so.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, that is all I want.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I understand that I have the floor, and that I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I did not understand that I had yielded the floor. I said I was ready to yield the floor, but the Senator from Tennessee said he wanted to ask me a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee said he would take the floor and ask a question in his time.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I did not understand him to say that. I beg the Chair's pardon.

Mr. WATSON. I will defer my question until later.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not very material who has the floor, but only one Senator can hold it at the same time.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I fully agree with the Senator from Washington in his abstract proposition of constitutional law and of our constitutional duty and of the duties and powers of the President; but I differ with him in the application of these principles. I think the Congress should confer upon the President, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, every possible power necessary to carry on this war with vigor and to a successful conclusion, as we directed him to do in the declaration of war; but I do not believe that the Constitution is abrogated by a state of war. I do not believe that, because of the existing war, Congress should abdicate its functions and require or authorize another branch of the Government to exercise them. I do not think we should destroy the distinctive feature of our republican form of government—distribution of the powers of government into three distinct, coordinate, and independent branches—the executive, the legislative, and the judicial.

I know, Mr. President, that there has been a tendency to do away with this division of power of government, to break down the barriers between the legislative and executive branches, but it has never been done by my consent and never will be. Whenever we do it, our form of government is destroyed. I think that Congress should assume its responsibilities and do its duty in prosecuting this war, and not require the President to do everything; and if it is necessary for Congress to stay here and discharge its duties, it should remain in continuous session for that purpose, and if any emergencies arise, we will be here to provide for them and to discharge our duties in reference to them.

I do not believe that this bill, as reported by the committee, is a constitutional measure. I am now referring to section 7. I will favor the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. My objections to the section are twofold.

I believe—as has already been stated, and it is unnecessary, except to express my own views, for me to repeat it—that this bill violates the section of the Constitution which provides that no preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another. Now, it is said by one Senator that we should trust the President, that he will not violate the Constitution and will not do anything that is wrong in this matter. I am perfectly willing to trust him as much as any other Senator on this floor, and have done so, and will continue to do so; but this Congress has no power to pass a law giving a preference to the ports of one State over those of another, and none to delegate the authority to do so to the President of the United States. It would be abdicating our functions, it would be shifting the responsibility from the Congress, to authorize another officer to do what it can not do, and a violation of the fundamental law.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SHIELDS. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator understands that in delegating a power which the Constitution does not authorize the Congress itself would be guilty of a violation of the Constitution. In other words, it would be just as reprehensible for Congress to undertake to confer upon the President of the United States powers forbidden by the Constitution, as it would be for the President to undertake to exercise authority not authorized by the Constitution.

Mr. SHIELDS. Most assuredly; and that is what I was trying to impress upon the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I hope the Senator did not understand that I was advocating anything of that kind?

Mr. SHIELDS. On the contrary, Mr. President, I understood the Senator objected to the bill on that very ground, and thought that it ought to be amended in that particular.

Now, I am not going to elaborate this proposition further. I think its soundness is recognized by everyone. That clause passed the committee inadvertently and without proper consideration.

I think there is another equally serious objection to this bill as framed, and that is that it is unquestionably a delegation of the legislative power of the Congress to the executive branch of the Government. I am aware, Mr. President, that the Supreme Court of the United States has gone a long ways in sustaining legislation of this character.

In the early days of this country a bill of this kind would have met with derision in this body.

In all our States, and it is part of the republican form of government guaranteed by the Constitution to the several States, the power of government is divided into three branches, the judicial, legislative, and executive, and there are express provisions in their constitutions that this power shall not be delegated to either of the other branches. Not only that but each of the three branches is prohibited from exercising the power belonging to either of the other two. There is no such express prohibition in the Constitution of the United States, yet it has always been so construed by all the text writers and by all the courts of the country.

As I said, a law like this in the early history of the country would have been held unconstitutional without argument. The courts would not have heard argument upon a proposition that was so plain. But since the Supreme Court has spoken upon the subject such legislation is valid.

The leading case on this subject is that of Field against Clark reported in One hundred and forty-third United States. That case states the rule so clearly that I am going to read an excerpt from it. The court said:

> That Congress can not delegate legislative power to the President is a principle universally recognized as vital to the integrity and maintenance of the system of government ordained by the Constitution. The act of October 1, 1890, in the particular under consideration is not inconsistent with that principle. It does not in any real sense invest the President with the power of legislation. For the purpose of securing reciprocal trade with countries producing and exporting sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, Congress itself determined that the provisions of the act of October 1, 1890, permitting the free introduction of such articles, should be suspended as to any country producing and exporting them that imposed exactions and duties on the agricultural and other products of the United States which the President deemed—that is, which he found to be—reciprocally unequal and unreasonable. Congress itself prescribed in advance the duties to be levied, collected, and paid on sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, or hides produced by or exported from such designated country while the suspension lasted. Nothing involving the expediency or the just operation of such legislation was left to the determination of the President. The words "he may deem," in the third section, of course, implied that the President would examine the commercial regulations of other countries producing and exporting sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides and form a judgment as to whether they were reciprocally equal and reasonable, or the contrary, in their effect upon American products. But when he ascertained the fact that duties and exactions reciprocally unequal and unreasonable were imposed upon the agricultural or other products of the United States by a country producing and exporting sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, or hides, it became his duty to issue a proclamation declaring the suspension, as to that country, which Congress had determined should occur.

Mr. OVERMAN. That left the President, then, to find the fact; and having found the fact, he was authorized to issue his proclamation? Am I right about that?

Mr. SHIELDS. Certainly; and that is what this bill does not do. I will yield further to the Senator when I finish the quotation.

Mr. OVERMAN. Very well.

Mr. SHIELDS (reading)—

> He had no discretion in the premises, except in respect to the duration of the suspension so ordered. But that related only to the enforcement of the policy established by Congress. As the suspension was absolutely required when the President ascertained the existence of a particular fact, it can not be said that, in ascertaining that fact and in issuing his proclamation in obedience to the legislative will, he exercised the function of making laws. Legislative power was exercised when Congress declared that the suspension should take effect upon a named contingency. What the President was required to do was simply in execution of the act of Congress. It was not the making of law. He was the mere agent of the law-making department to ascertain and declare the event upon which its expressed will was to take effect. It was a part of the law itself as it left the hands of Congress that the provisions, full and complete in themselves—> permitting the free introduction of sugars, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides from particular countries should be suspended in a given contingency, and that in case of such suspensions certain duties should be imposed.

A thing this is not—

> "The true distinction," as Judge Ranney, speaking for the Supreme Court of Ohio, has well said, "is between the delegation of power to make the law, which necessarily involves a discretion as to what it shall be, and conferring authority or discretion as to its execution, to be exercised under and in pursuance of the law."

Judge Ranney has just answered the argument the Senator from North Carolina proposes to make. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. OVERMAN. What are the facts before us? He finds a condition just like the Interstate Commerce Commission finds, that a certain rate is reasonable and then puts it into effect. Here the President must find the condition, and he issues his proclamation just as the Interstate Commerce Commission issues its order when it finds a rate reasonable or unreasonable, and when he finds the fact that public safety and public welfare of this Nation require it, and that is the only thing he finds, the public safety requires it, the welfare requires it, he finds that it is a fact, that it is absolutely necessary for the safety of this country to issue this proclamation, and when he does that the law goes into effect by his proclamation, just like an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission goes into effect.

Mr. SHIELDS. To my mind the conception of the Senator from North Carolina of what is a finding of fact is as nebulous as the milky way. I can not see how it can be said that "the public safety" or "the public welfare is a fact," a definite and fixed fact upon the happening of which powers like this legislation proposes to delegate can be made effective or operative. The fact to be found should be definite, certain. People should know the rule by which they are to be governed.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. SHIELDS. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. What is the difference between the phraseology employed and a law which will say that whenever the President shall deem it for the public good he may do any particular thing that he sees fit to do?

Mr. SHIELDS. Absolutely nothing. That is what the public safety and the public welfare mean.

Mr. REED. It is about equivalent to saying when the President thinks it ought to be done he shall do it.

Mr. SHIELDS. Whenever the President, in his opinion, believes that it ought to be the law, he will enact it. That is what it means.

The case from which I have read is, perhaps, the leading case upon this subject. It does not in any way authorize legislation delegating the broad power to the Executive to enact laws in regard to any subject matter either in an emergency or for general application through all time.

Mr. President, we have never had in the history of this country such embargo legislation except one act enacted June 3, 1794, which the then Executive of the Nation refrained from putting into execution.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SHIELDS. I yield.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator says there is no other act that he can recollect that was ever passed by this Nation.

Mr. SHIELDS. No; I did not say that. I said that there never was but one, and that that act was passed June 3, 1794; but that the then Executive did not execute it.

Mr. OVERMAN. What does the Senator think of this act passed April 22, 1898?—

That the President is hereby authorized, in his discretion, and with such limitations and exceptions as shall seem to him expedient, to prohibit the export of coal or other material used in war from any seaport of the United States until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress.

Mr. SHIELDS. I think if such an act was passed, it was absolutely unconstitutional, but the Senator is not reading all of the act.

Mr. OVERMAN. I read all of it.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will come to that.

Mr. REED. Was it ever construed by a court?

Mr. OVERMAN. No; it was never construed, but I suppose the Judiciary Committee reported it out, and it was passed.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Judiciary Committee reported out this proposed act, too.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; the committee ordered it reported favorably, but I notice that most of the members of the Judiciary Committee are opposed to it.

Mr. SHIELDS. I was not present when it was ordered reported out, but if I had been and had voted for it and then upon a subsequent examination and consideration I saw that it violated the fundamental law and was vicious, I would vote against it upon this floor.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator from Tennessee let me call his attention in connection with that act to the fact that it does not apply to all commodities? It is not nearly so broad as the one now before us. It only applies to coal and other material used in the war.

Mr. SHIELDS. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am talking about the constitutionality of it. The Senator says it is unconstitutional.

Mr. REED. I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina if the passage of an act by Congress is conclusive evidence or even persuasive evidence that it is constitutional?

Mr. OVERMAN. I have not made that point, yet I say Congress has done it, and it is a precedent, and it has some persuasive force. There were great lawyers here in that day; there were some of the greatest who ever sat in this Chamber when that act was passed. Such men as Spooner, Foraker, Hoar of Massachusetts, reported that bill out of one of the greatest committees that ever existed, and they would not have reported it out unless they thought it was constitutional. Therefore to that extent it ought to be persuasive.

Mr. SHIELDS. I wish to say one thing further in this connection about the Judiciary Committee reporting this bill out. The power of legislation under the Constitution is vested in the Congress of the United States and not the departments of the other branches of the Government. I have observed when bills like this are prepared in one of the departments to carry out some specific object which they have in mind and sent here to be introduced and enacted into law, they generally contain some provision that ought never to have the slightest recognition in this or any other legislative body. In my opinion, every bill introduced into the Senate ought to be drawn by a Senator. Bills ought to come from the body which is to enact them into law and not from an interested department.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am inclined to agree with the Senator on that; but this bill came from the President. The Attorney General sent it to us.

Mr. SHIELDS. I thought so, and that is why I made the remark I did.

Mr. OVERMAN. Why did not the Senator make the point before the committee? If he had made a motion not to consider it, or stated why it ought not to be considered according to his idea, we might have agreed with him. But he did not make that point in the committee.

Mr. SHIELDS. I was not present.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator is a member of the Judiciary Committee, but we did not have the advantage of his great argument there.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have made that objection to bills prepared by the departments.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator ought to have offered the objection before the committee as he is a member of the committee.

Mr. SHIELDS. I would have done so had I been present. I was engaged otherwise when this section was considered. Now, Mr. President, let us go into the history of our legislation upon the subject of embargoes.

The first one was a joint resolution of Congress of March 26, 1794:

An embargo was laid for 30 days on all ships and vessels in ports of the United States bound for any foreign port or place. The immediate cause was the British order in council of November 6, 1793, and a reported hostile speech by Lord Dorchester to the Indian tribes which were in hostility with the United States. It was expected that the measure would lead to a restriction of the supply of provisions to the British Fleet in the West Indies, though the letter of the act operated equally against the French. Washington, in a message to Congress of March 28, 1794, stated that he had requested the governors of the several States to call out the militia for the detention of vessels, if necessary; and he recommended that the embargo be extended to fishing vessels, to which it had not been held to apply. It was also construed not to apply to armed vessels possessing public commissions, except letters of marque. By resolution of April 18, 1794, the embargo was extended to May 25, 1794. On April 7, 1794, a resolution was introduced in Congress to suspend intercourse with Great Britain in British productions, but when Jay's mission to England was announced it was dropped. For the same reason the act of June 4, 1794, which was to remain in force till 15 days after the commencement of the next session of Congress, and by which the President was authorized to lay an embargo whenever in his opinion the public safety should require it, remained unexecuted. By an act of May 22, 1794, however, the exportation of munitions of war was prohibited for a year, and their importation free of duty was authorized for two years.

In a special message to Congress of December 18, 1807, President Jefferson, in view of the injuries inflicted on American commerce under Napoleon's Berlin decree of November 21, 1806, and the British decrees of blockade and orders in council, recommended "an inhibition of the departure of our vessels from the ports of the United States." The Senate, in secret session, by a vote of 22 to 6, passed a bill laying an embargo on all shipping, foreign and domestic, in the ports of the United States. The House, with closed doors, passed the bill, after a debate of three days, by a vote of 82 to 44. The bill became a law by the approval of the President on December 22, 1807. To the immediate operation of this measure an exception was made in favor of foreign vessels, which were allowed to depart, either loaded or in ballast, on receiving notice of the act. The embargo was repealed by the act of March 1, 1809, which substituted a policy of nonintercourse.

On April 1, 1812, President Madison sent a message to Congress recommending another embargo. An appropriate act was adopted on April 6, 1812, and this was followed on the 14th of April by an act prohibiting exportations by land.

Mr. President, the act of June 19, 1794, was the only act which broadly authorized the President to proclaim an embargo upon shipping from the ports of the United States. In all others Congress itself laid the embargo in fixed and express terms. None of them, except the one I have mentioned, delegated the power to the President which is attempted to be delegated by this bill.

Now, mark the provisions of the act of June 4, 1794. It was not so broad as this and had many safeguards thrown around it. It provided:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized and empowered whenever, in his opinion, the public safety shall so require, to lay an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports of the United States, or upon the ships and vessels of the United States, or the ships and vessels of any foreign nation, under such regulations as the circumstances of the case may require, and to continue or revoke the same, whenever he shall think proper. And the President is hereby fully authorized to give all such orders to the officers of the United States as may be necessary to carry the same into full effect: Provided, The authority aforesaid shall not be exercised while the Congress of the United States shall be in session.

Congress recognized that it had some functions to discharge, and that it ought to discharge them, when this act was passed.

And any embargo, which may be laid by the President as aforesaid, shall cease and determine in 15 days from the actual meeting of Congress next after laying the same.

And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue and be in force until 15 days after the commencement of the next session of Congress.

Mr. President, I have said, guarded as this act was, and limited in its application, still the President did not enforce it. It remained a dead letter upon our statute books. I think the provisions of the one in Mr. Jefferson's day, which was referred to by the Senator from Utah yesterday, in stating that Jefferson laid an embargo on ports south of the Chesapeake Bay, authorized the President to make exceptions at any time upon the finding of certain facts; but the embargo itself was laid by Congress, and only certain exceptions were allowed to be made by the Executive.

I understand the Senator from Montana also stated that Mr. Lincoln declared an embargo as to certain ports of the Southern States during the Civil War. I think that the Senator from Montana is mistaken in his statement. The Southern States were then in insurrection; and, having a regular form of government and the power to maintain law and order, were for many purposes recognized as a belligerent government. I know the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States are not altogether consistent upon this subject, and do not fully support my statement; but the Confederate States were certainly to some extent a belligerent government, and Mr. Lincoln, in the suppression of the insurrection, very properly, and with full authority under the Constitution, as a war measure directed a blockade of their ports and carried on an effective blockade by sending the Navy of the United States to each and every one of those ports, and blockade runners were constantly seized and their ships condemned.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And, Mr. President, if the Senator from Tennessee will allow me, the entire treatment of foreign vessels that were seized by the Navy of the United States was upon the theory that they were seeking to run a blockade; and the suppression of the trade was enforced upon the ground that it was a legally sustained blockade against a belligerent.

Mr. SHIELDS. That is my recollection; I do not think there can be any doubt of the facts.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And those cases have been cited during the past two years over and over again by the nations of the world as the cases of opposing belligerents and blockade cases.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SHIELDS. I yield.

Mr. KING. I do not know that the statute to which I am about to refer controverts the view of my friend; but I invite his attention to the fact that, in addition to the blockade statutes to which he has referred there was another act enacted by the Congress during the days of the Civil War, under which all commerce between the North and the South was prohibited, except under such circumstances as might be determined by the President of the United States; and if he found certain facts, then commercial intercourse between the North and the South might be resumed. Would not that act come within the principles for which my friend is contending?

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I think not. That was only by statute recognizing the general law of nonintercourse with enemies and prohibiting the citizens of States at war from trading and dealing with each other. That statute was a further implied recognition that the Confederate States were a belligerent power and an enemy, and that intercourse could be prohibited with them.

Mr. President, coming now to the provision of this bill as reported by the committee, it is in these words:

SECTION 1. Whenever the United States is at war and the President shall find that the public safety or welfare shall so require, and shall make proclamation thereof, it shall be unlawful to export any article or articles from the United States, except at such time or times, and from such place or places, and under such regulations and orders, and subject to such limitations and exceptions as the President shall prescribe, until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress.

Now, I think that is in excess of the power that can be delegated by the Congress of the United States to the Executive of the Nation. I concede freely that, under the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in these latter days and times, the Congress can enact a law providing that when the executive department finds that certain facts exist, and proclamation is made, the law shall become operative and take effect. Such is the amendment of the Senator from Georgia. While those are not its exact terms, yet that is its fair construction; but it is not a fair construction of the pending bill. What may be "the public safety" or "the public welfare"? I remark right here that the words "public welfare" were not in the act of 1794; the words "public safety" alone were in that act; and there is a vast difference between "public safety" and "public welfare." "Public safety" applies more particularly to an emergency like that which is now confronting the country, to a state of war, whereas the expression "public welfare" might apply to the economic interests of the country and many other interests than those of war, which make drastic legislation necessary under many circumstances.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. SHIELDS. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to ask the Senator a question at that point. Does not the Senator think that to confer upon the President the power delegated in the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, namely, to prohibit the export of goods which he had reason to believe had an enemy destination, is a definite enough power?

Mr. SHIELDS. I have just made the statement that I thought that was definite, and for that reason I would support the amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. LODGE. I did not catch the Senator's statement.

Mr. SHIELDS. And if any other case were stated, for instance, the contention of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] that we are short of tin cans and there is a great national necessity that the export of them be prohibited, if a prohibition on their export were written in this bill, either to take effect immediately or upon the finding of the President that such necessity exists, then I would support such a provision. I will support any such measure which is to become effective whenever the precedent facts are found to exist. I am entirely willing to trust the President of the United States in finding that a certain state of facts does exist which makes it necessary for the law to go into effect, and to vest in him the power to make the proclamation, so that the people of the country may know that the law is effective and operative. I think that should be done.

An embargo upon foodstuffs, as well as upon munitions of war, has been agitated for two or three years. I never have been in favor of any embargo, because up to this time I have never believed that it was necessary. I have never believed that in supplying our products to the nations of Europe, or to those of them who could come and get them, or to any that our ships could reach, we violated the laws of nations or that there was anything wrong in doing so.

The first suggestion of an embargo along the lines of the amendment of the Senator from Georgia was made to a bill that was introduced by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], I believe. I ask the Senator from Utah if I am not correct?

Mr. KING. I submitted a resolution asking for certain information from the Department of Commerce relative to the exportations from this country which found their way into Germany and others of the central powers, and stated at the time that I had a bill prepared having for its object the interdiction of such exports as found their way through neutral territory into the nations with which we are at war.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee allow me to interrupt him for just a moment?

Mr. SHIELDS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I want to say that several of us upon the Judiciary Committee, myself among the number, gathered from that suggestion that the provision would apply to restrictions on shipments to enemy countries. Having engagements at other committees, I did not watch the provision, and I did not know that it had been changed from the original suggestion of the Senator from Utah to what it is until the bill came into the Senate. Of course, that was my fault, and the fault of no one else; but I was called to another committee and could not be present at the Judiciary Committee. I thought we were going to proceed on the suggestion of the Senator from Utah, and it seemed so entirely proper that I, for one, gave no further attention to it.

Mr. SHIELDS. I doubtless misunderstood the Senator from Utah. I know that I promptly and cordially concurred with him in the suggestion when made. I believe that such an embargo should be declared; and if it is known that there are any neutral countries which are receiving our exports and furnishing them to Germany, I would be willing to write the names of those countries in this bill and to establish an embargo as to them, without waiting for the President to make a proclamation. Such a measure would be meritorious. It is one that is proper in the national defense, and it ought to be the law, and doubtless will be, before this week is over.

Furthermore, if there is any article the exportation of which from this country ought to be prohibited in aid of the national defense, it ought to be so provided in this bill. If there is any article which we are now exporting that may be used to our injury, we ought to lay an embargo upon it, to take effect whenever the President finds it is being so used.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SHIELDS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am very much in sympathy with much of what the Senator from Tennessee has said, but I am not quite sure that I understand the legal distinctions which he has drawn.

As I understand, the Senator says that in his opinion it would be constitutional to forbid the exportation of products which reach the enemy's country; that is to say, it would be constitutional to pass a law by which the President would be authorized by proclamation to forbid the exportation from this country of any product which he found went into an enemy's country. Suppose that the President should find that an article which is manufactured in our own country is absolutely necessary for the defense of our own country. Would it not be constitutional to pass a law saying that the President, whenever he finds that any article is essential for the defense of this land, may by proclamation prohibit its exportation to some other country?

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I do not feel that I can go as far as the Senator from Utah has suggested; but when I was interrupted I was coming to the point of prohibiting the exportation of articles required by this country. As I said a few minutes ago, I had been opposed to all embargoes; I had been opposed to one upon foodstuffs, and I can not say that I am entirely prepared to come to that now; but the stream of tendency of my mind runs very strongly in that direction when I consider the high cost of living, the outrageous prices for which the necessities of life are now selling, and the great distress in this country on that account. I believed the agricultural interests ought to have the advantage of the high prices; and that the farmers of this country should reap some benefit from the conditions existing, just as the manufacturers and their employees are receiving high prices and wages from the manufacture and exportation of manufactured articles. I did not believe in any discriminatory legislation, and I so wrote my constituents.

But there is now an extraordinary state of affairs prevailing in this country. I hope the coming crop will relieve it. I believe it will; but if it is necessary at any time to prohibit the exportation of foodstuffs in order to supply this country with cheaper food, I will give very great weight to such a suggestion. I can not and will not ignore the interests of the poorer people of the country.

I am willing to enact the most drastic laws for the vigorous prosecution of this war, and I have voted for laws of that character against my inclination.

I have as much love for the history and traditions of the State which I have the honor in part to represent in this Chamber as any Senator has for his State. I am proud of Tennessee, of her people, and of her history. I am proud of the fact that her men have been upon almost every battle field in every war of this country, and on every occasion have distinguished themselves. You will pardon me when I say that I believe them to be the best, the bravest, and the most patriotic people in the world. I am proud of the fact that the greatest military genius this Nation has produced was a Tennesseean—Andrew Jackson. His name arouses enthusiasm in every hamlet and in every hollow and upon every hill in Tennessee, and will ever do so. He was a great Democrat and a great President, and his public services added glory and renown to the whole Nation.

We are proud of the volunteers who in the gloomy days of this country met on the Watauga and went over the mountains and won the Battle of Kings Mountain, which was like a sunburst that gave new hope and stimulated the patriotism of the people of the Colonies from Massachusetts to Georgia. This victory was a turning point in the Revolutionary War in its very darkest days, and the men that won it were volunteers. But I want to call attention to a fact that that occurred when these mountain men met upon the banks of the Watauga at Sycamore Shoals to go over the mountains and meet the British. The call to arms brought out almost every man in the mountains.

At that time the Creeks and the Choctaws were threatening an uprising, and a very serious question presented itself: "Shall all of our men go across the mountains to meet the British? What will become of our families here?" Practically every man in those mountains wanted to go, and finally it was agreed that they would conscript enough men to stay at home and protect their families against the marauding Indians, and it was done. That is the first time there was any conscription upon the soil of America, and a glorious conscription it was.

Tennesseeans volunteered when they went to New Orleans and won that great battle under Jackson. They volunteered when the Civil War came on. We furnished 110,000 soldiers to the Confederate Army and 30,000 to the Federal Army, and no braver men fought in that war. The records of the War Department show that, in proportion to the territory and population, there are more volunteers in the Regular Army from the mountains of east Tennessee than from any other section of the United States, and that their superiors as soldiers are not to be found.

I did not doubt but that Tennesseeans would fully answer the call to arms and volunteer for the full quota that would be required of our State. But we are in war; we have a powerful enemy confronting us, and I do not believe that we ought to speculate as to what might be done. I believed that by universal service and a selective draft we could certainly raise an army in the limited time required, and that we ought not to take any chances. I thought that we ought to let Germany and the whole world know that we were in earnest; that we were going to have an army to answer the emergency, ready to meet our enemies upon any field and at any time. I voted for the selective draft against my sentiments, against what I might say my wishes, because I did not consider it a local matter, because I believed it a great national measure, which the emergency upon us demanded our support.

Now, I am willing to give the President all the power we can constitutionally and rightfully give him to prosecute the war successfully, but I do not believe that Congress ought to abdicate any of its functions. Congress can remain here and discharge its duties just as well as the President, and it ought to do so.

The President does not want power which the Congress can not constitutionally confer upon him, and would not have it. I have the utmost confidence in the ability and patriotism of the President, and will go as far as any Senator in upholding and supporting him in this great emergency.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President——

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Does the Senator yield, and to whom?

Mr. SHIELDS. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. I just wanted to say that I did not interrupt the Senator when he was talking about Kings Mountain, but I believe at that time Tennessee was part of North Carolina.

Mr. SHIELDS. I did not say anything about that.

Mr. OVERMAN. I said they were Tennesseeans, and that Tennesseeans did their duty and exhibited great heroism there, but the commander there was a man who lived over on the North Carolina side. The most of the troops, too, were from North Carolina.

Mr. KING. As the Senators know, 100 cities claimed the birthplace of Homer.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am not detracting from Tennesseeans at all, because Tennessee then was a part of North Carolina.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have heard that North Carolinians claimed that, but it is known of all men that the Battle of Kings Mountain was won by Sevier, Campbell, and Shelby and their riflemen from the mountains.

Mr. OVERMAN. And McDowell. The Senator has left out McDowell, who was the commander there—Joseph McDowell.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will my colleague yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to his colleague?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

Mr. McKELLAR. I just want to reply for a moment to the statement of my distinguished friend from North Carolina that the troops there were in command of a North Carolinian. He is in error about it. The troops were in command of a Virginian and two Tennesseans—Gen. John Sevier first and Isaac Shelby, who really lived partly in one State and partly in the other, partly in Kentucky and partly in Tennessee. Gen. McDowell was not in command of those troops.

Mr. OVERMAN. There were two McDowells.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will examine the records of history he will find that he was mistaken.

Mr. OVERMAN. I know something about the history of it. Gen. McDowell was the commander, but he was not there on the day of the battle. They had sent him back to Rutherford, I believe; but Gen. Charles McDowell was the general of all that country. The other one was Joseph McDowell.

Mr. McKELLAR. That may be true, but Gen. Charles McDowell was not in command of the troops when the battle was fought and won, but the Tennesseans were.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to say that not only Tennesseans were there, but Virginians and Marylanders and North Carolinians.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senators from North Carolina and Tennessee that in the realm of patriotism there is no competition or rivalry. There is glory enough for both Tennessee and North Carolina in the achievements of their heroic sons in that unique period of our Nation's history.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What we want is to have North Carolina mentioned as well as Tennessee.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I am opposed to this amendment. I do not agree with the statement of the law as made by the distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS]. As I understand the law, we are not allowed to delegate legislative power at all. There is an unbroken line of authorities to that effect. It has not been decided otherwise. As I understand the bill, there is no attempt whatever to delegate legislative power. There seems to be a necessity for this sort of a regulation. We are delegating to the President the power to determine a particular thing, and declaring, when he has determined and declared that that fact exists, that the law shall be so and so. We are making the law to fit the conditions as they may be determined by this fact that is referred to the President for his ascertainment.

Down in all our States we have delegated to administrative boards the power to make rates, to make regulations, and to make orders, and we have said that if these rates when made are violated or if these orders are violated, then the punishment shall be so and so, making the law ourselves. That is no more than the kind of regulation you have here. We have the power to do this thing ourselves, and we do not know what the facts may be. We realize that the necessity may exist, and we say it can be determined in this way.

I am going to say here and now that I am not going to stickle any further at the grant of power to the administrative department. I say here and now to the Senator from Tennessee that there is no necessity for this Congress staying in session during and throughout this war to grant such power to the President or make such laws as he may think are necessary, because if a given law was regarded necessary and was demanded by the administration it would be passed by this Congress without regard to whether it overturned the precedents and practice and traditions of this Nation from all time to now.

Lord Northcliffe has said that democracy is a bad war maker; that the power must be concentrated in the hands of one man, or a few men, in order that it may be exercised successfully in waging war. You have all believed it. The power has been concentrated up to now. This is but a further concentration of power.

The Senator from Tennessee talked about the volunteer system, and regretted that he had had to vote against it. I want to say that Northcliffe told us the condition yonder in England, and it is true that they were not able to compel the British Parliament to go to the conscript system as against the volunteer system for raising an army until war had raged for two whole years and 5,000,000 men had volunteered, and the London press has expressed amazement that President Wilson was able to compel the Congress to adopt the conscript system at the very beginning of this war for the raising of an army to fight 3,000 miles from home.

Now, there is no use in talking about concentration of power further. If this power is necessary—and the administration seems to think that it is necessary—then give it to the administration and let the war proceed. I do not think there is any constitutional objection to it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am going to suggest an amendment to this section—to strike out, in lines 22 and 23, the words "and from such place or places."

Whatever may be constitutional or unconstitutional, I am perfectly clear that the President can not close one port and open another, or close the ports of one State and leave the others open, under the provisions of the Constitution. If it is unconstitutional, as I believe it is, I think the only way is to take out the words which carry the unconstitutional power.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question. The purpose of the law is not to discriminate against ports, but it is to authorize the President to exercise a certain power under a condition that may exist, and that provision of the Constitution providing against discrimination as between ports would not affect this law at all. In my opinion it would not be in contravention of it.

Mr. LODGE. If the President has the power to put an embargo on the ports of one State and take it off the ports of another State, it seems to me—I say it with all submission—to contradict the distinct prohibition of the Constitution.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. KING. I am not very familiar with the present statutes, but my understanding is that the President may under certain circumstances abolish ports. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts if that is not the law?

Mr. LODGE. Abolish ports?

Mr. KING. Yes; close ports.

Mr. LODGE. How do you mean to abolish ports?

Mr. KING. To close them and forbid exportations from that port. Suppose, for instance, a port happens to be unprofitable, may not the President close that port?

Mr. LODGE. The only power we have is about making it a port of entry, of course, for the entry of goods. That is all we can do. We can not change the ports.

Mr. KING. To what does the Constitution refer when it provides that no preference shall be given?

Mr. LODGE. It refers to export duties.

Mr. STONE. If my friend from Massachusetts will permit me, I think the Senator from Utah has reference to the bill which was passed five or six years ago, which authorized the President to discontinue certain ports or to make them subports.

Mr. LODGE. That is a port of entry, as I said.

Mr. KING. That is the law to which I referred.

Mr. LODGE. That is a very different thing.

Mr. KING. Then, if the President may discontinue a port may he not forbid exportations from that port by closing it?

Mr. LODGE. I do not think he can under the language of the Constitution. I think they are wholly different things. In the first place a port of entry is the entry from abroad, but I do not think it is in the power of the President or of Congress to discriminate by an embargo or an export duty against one State over another.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is not an export duty a regulation of commerce?

Mr. LODGE. It refers to export duty; but surely if you are not allowed to discriminate in an export duty I think ex necessitate you can not discriminate by prohibition.

Mr. OVERMAN. The only prohibition is that the President shall not do an unconstitutional act.

Mr. LODGE. No; nor the Congress. It is often attempted.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think we sometimes do it.

Mr. LODGE. We attempt it.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the President attempted to do such a thing it would be unconstitutional of course.

Mr. LODGE. I see no merit in those words; in any event, no necessity for them. I think if he has the power "except at such time or times and under such regulations and orders," and so forth, he has ample authority of all the purposes of this section.

Mr. President, I am not going to enter into the much-mooted question of delegated power. I do not think it is necessary. Our controlling purpose is to give the President power to carry on the war. I will go as far as anyone in giving him every power as Commander in Chief and responsible for the conduct of the war to enable him to carry the war to a successful conclusion as speedily as possible. One of the powers which is very necessary is expressed in the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia.

The trouble with this paragraph, to my mind, is not the question whether we are delegating legislative power but that we are framing a provision wholly apart from the war. It has been illustrated here this morning. The effort here that has been expressed by the Senator from Maine and others is not an attempt to forward the war. It is an effort to give the President a certain power with the hope that he will yield to the pressure from those who are interested to protect an American industry. Other industries would like protection. There are many industries that would like to have a prohibition of exports put on, so as to keep their raw materials in the country. There are some industries much greater than the canning industry.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not think the Senator put it on that ground.

Mr. LODGE. I am coming to the war aspect of it. It is to keep tin plate in the country in order to enable the canning industries to go on. We are not to export the tin plate.

Mr. President, that seems to me to be a matter for Congress to determine without any question. I have no idea myself that the President, if given the power, would do anything of the sort which is demanded here. Where do we get our tin? It has already been pointed out we get it exclusively from the Straits Settlements. The export from Wales ceased many years ago. The Straits Settlements, which furnish all the tin, is an English possession. England's first duty is to feed her own men. Suppose we say that tin plate shall not go out of this country. We can hardly blame England if she stops the export of tin plate to this country from the Straits Settlements. The Senator from Maine recognizes that, because he said we must not stop the export of canned food to Canada.

Let us go a step further. Tin plate, for instance, is needed for oil containers. That is a very important interest in Russia and an important element in the war. Are we prepared to say to Russia at the present time, "You shall not have any tin from us?" It may be proper to do so, but it seems to me that it requires a little more consideration of all these various conditions than can be given here in a brief debate.

My objection is fundamental. The purpose of this section is to give the President power to promote war measures; and I will go any distance in that direction; but when it comes to giving him power to help this industry and to help that industry and to refuse to help a third industry, all wholly domestic, I think we are conferring a power which ought never to be parted with by Congress, because it is not a war power. It relates solely to domestic products with no reference to the war; and there, I think, we are entering upon most dangerous ground.

If there are other war purposes like that accurately described in the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, I will give the President the fullest powers that can be devised, but I think that the language of this section is very loose indeed.

Mr. OVERMAN. Suppose other conditions should arise in the absence of Congress, then the President would have the power the amendment the Senator from Georgia gives him. It is limited to one thing—that is, that goods shall not be shipped into the enemy's country from a neutral country.

Mr. LODGE. I believe the amendment of the Senator from Georgia would give the President full power to prevent any export from this country to enemy destination or what he believes to be enemy destination.

Mr. OVERMAN. Suppose it is necessary to the welfare and safety of the country that our food products should be kept at home. Does not the Senator think that the President should have that power?

Mr. LODGE. I think that power can be safely left to Congress.

Mr. OVERMAN. Suppose Congress was not here, and it developed during the war.

Mr. LODGE. It does not take very long for Congress to get here.

Mr. OVERMAN. Suppose the safety of the country depended on it.

Mr. LODGE. It will not be imperiled in 24 hours or in a week, if it is a domestic question.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the President should find that the salvation of the country, the safety and welfare of our Republic——

Mr. LODGE. Has to be saved in a day?

Mr. OVERMAN. It might have to be saved in a day, before Congress could get here.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think so, so far as protection of our own industries is concerned.

Mr. OVERMAN. The way this bill is going to take, it would require two months to pass it, and it never would pass, probably, the way lawyers here differ about constitutional law.

Mr. LODGE. I am not making a point on the law at all; but there is nothing immediate in this particular provision. This tin-plate business is a perfect illustration of the danger you are running into, and the pressure you are preparing to put on the President from many quarters. This tin-plate proposition is not a war measure. It is not immediate. The country is not going to perish if we do not protect tin plate to-morrow.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not know anything about tin plate, or who are interested in tin plate, but I know those who are interested—the farmers who are canning these vegetables, beans, corn, and so forth, who are not interested in the tin-plate business, who have nothing to do with it—come here to the Senate and say that all the canning industries have shut down, and the people must have cans this summer to can their vegetables. It has been stated that we must can enough this year to feed 500,000 men in our Army and the canneries are now shut down. Why? Because tin plate is being shipped abroad. If that is the truth—I do not know; I never heard of it before until it was announced on the floor of the Senate—and if our people can not get the tin to make the cans to furnish people cans with which to can their fruit for our soldiers during the war, it seems to me we are in a bad condition.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have the greatest possible sympathy with the farmer and I know how much we depend upon him. I am ready to do everything for him, but I think he is being a little bit overworked in this Chamber. We want to win this war. We know that to-day the great question before us is to get supplies to the armies that are fighting the common foe, because we have no army to put into the field, and we are proposing deliberately in this amendment to cut off one form of supplies. If we are going to cut off the supplies which the allies need we might as well abandon any anxiety about ships if we are not going to give them anything to carry.

Mr. OVERMAN. I dislike to interrupt the Senator, but I wish to say that we do not propose to do anything of the kind. We propose to leave it to the President of the United States to say whether that condition exists or not.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have no belief for a moment that the President of the United States would commit some of the follies which Congress is authorizing him to commit. I have no idea he will do it but——

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of New Mexico in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. FERNALD. May I ask the Senator whether he considers food as essential as munitions of war to fight the war?

Mr. LODGE. I consider them extremely essential to the countries on the other side of the water. I do not think this country is in any danger of starvation.

Mr. FERNALD. Does not the Senator recognize the fact that there is some shortage of food in this country?

Mr. LODGE. I am perfectly aware that there is a shortage owing to general war conditions, but I do not believe that you are going to help this war to a conclusion by preventing us from feeding the people who are fighting the same battle that we are. I know it is desirable for gentlemen who can foods, and I am sorry they should be interfered with. There are other industries in my State in like condition. I should like, for example, to see an embargo put on certain kinds of leather, but I hope that the President will not do it even if he is given the power, for it is a domestic work—a war question. I think we are entering upon very perilous ground when we begin to put on embargoes solely for the purpose of protecting our own industries.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. FERNALD. I rather resent the personal reference to its being the canner who is interested.

Mr. LODGE. I was not aware that I was making any personal reference. I did not know, or I had perhaps forgotten, that the Senator was a canner. Nothing would induce me to make a reference in that way to my friend the Senator from Maine, and if I seemed to do so I greatly regret it.

Mr. FERNALD. The canners of this country naturally want to see the tin plate kept in the country.

Mr. LODGE. Naturally, and so are the shoemakers interested in keeping leather here.

Mr. FERNALD. They are no more interested than all the people of the country outside of the military forces. There is a great shortage of food in the country, and it is very necessary that we provide more food the coming season. This is the important time, right now when the packers are making their contracts with the farmers. A great deal depends upon whether they are to have their containers or whether they are not going to have them to take care of the coming crop.

Mr. LODGE. I understood also that the prohibition was to extend to the container after it was filled except in the case of the Canadians. We shall not send food abroad to help the countries which we must help, if we are going to carry on this war at all, by putting it in tin plate and then prohibiting the exportation of tin plate.

Mr. WATSON. Does this proposition involve that?

Mr. LODGE. I understood the Senator from Maine said that he thought the Canadian exports of canned food ought not to be prohibited. So I judge that the containers are to be prohibited from export elsewhere.

Mr. FERNALD. I did not have reference to food.

Mr. LODGE. I thought that the Senator mentioned the number of cans sent to Canada filled with food.

Mr. FERNALD. I do not recall that I did. I said we took 1,300,000 boxes of tin plate to Canada last year.

Mr. LODGE. That makes it even more strong.

Mr. FERNALD. I assume the President would use his judgment as to where the food should be shipped and as to where embargoes should be placed, on what countries, and no countries that were allies of ours would be deprived of food or tin plate.

Mr. LODGE. Tin plate is not going to any enemy power. The tin plate is being exported only to countries that are on the side we are on in the war or to neutrals. The amendment of the Senator from Georgia covers the case of the neutral if it have enemy destination. So we may be sure that this tin plate goes only to friendly or allied powers. I do not believe we have been sending out tin plate to Germany or to Austria or to Turkey.

Mr. FERNALD. Does the Senator think it is as important to send tin plate to Asia to be used in the oil business as it is to retain it here to be used in conserving the food production of the country?

Mr. LODGE. I think it is a great deal more important to have our supply of tin, as we are getting it now, and export some of it rather than to have it all cut off. You are running the risk of having it all cut off. People are just as ready to protect themselves as you are to protect yourself. The desire to protect one's self is not confined to this country. Human nature is pretty evenly distributed, and if you shut off the export of some material for the purpose of protecting our own people, other nations will protect their own people. I am more than ready to give the President all the war powers possible, and the sole distinction I make is that here we are leaving the field of war and entering on the wholly different field of helping the domestic producers. I desire to help the domestic producer in any way I can, but it seems to me that subject is the business of Congress; it certainly is not a war measure, protecting one American industry and not protecting another. That is something for Congress to say, and that is the reason why it seems to me this is dangerous legislation.

Mr. OVERMAN. Congress does limit it, I suggest to the Senator, by saying that it must be "for the safety of the country."

Mr. REED. "Or."

Mr. OVERMAN. "Or for its welfare."

Mr. LODGE. Preceding it is a question of public welfare that tin plate is to be guarded. I need not say to the Senator——

Mr. OVERMAN. In time of war; you must take the word "war." It is used for the safety of the public and the welfare of the Republic on account of the war in protecting the industry.

Mr. LODGE. It is not so worded. It simply says whenever the United States is at war, and of course this will not pass beyond the period of the war; I quite recognize that; but under this language "provided the country is at war" you are giving the President the right to help any industry he thinks may deserve assistance.

Mr. WALSH. I inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts whether in his judgment the sections might stand with the words "the welfare" stricken out?

Mr. LODGE. I think to take the words "or welfare" out would improve it enormously. I need not say to the Senator from Montana that through the public-welfare clause of the Constitution a number of Federal powers have entered in. It is a very broad expression, as the Senator knows.

Mr. WALSH. I am impressed with that view myself, and I think the Senator from North Carolina might well agree to leave out those words.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have accepted that amendment, and also to strike out the words "time and place."

Mr. LODGE. I do not see any objection to the word "time." I think it is better to leave it in.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am willing to leave that out.

Mr. LODGE. All I ask is that the words "or welfare" be omitted. That will improve it immensely.

Mr. OVERMAN. I accept that, because I think when it says "public safety" that includes welfare just as well.

Mr. WALSH. I think so. Let me say to the Senator from North Carolina, however, that I rather prefer the suggestion made by the Senator from Minnesota, that the language of the Constitution be added to the section, so that it shall read:

Provided, however, That no regulation shall give to the ports of one State a preference over those of another.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will accept that.

Mr. WALSH. Then I think there could be no objection on that score.

Mr. LODGE. That would protect that portion of it completely; but that would not get rid of the words "or welfare."

Mr. WALSH. Let me suggest that instead of amending that portion of it referring to time and place we strike out "or welfare."

Mr. LODGE. That would be satisfactory to me, leaving in time and place, as the Senator suggests; but I would like to have the words "or welfare" removed. It may be very much for the public welfare to prohibit the export of some product of some industry or the raw material. It may not matter at all to the public safety. I think what we are first considering now is public safety and the war.

Mr. WALSH. I feel impressed with this idea, that if that part of the section is not amended the President will be subject to all kinds of importunities——

Mr. LODGE. I agree with the Senator most fully.

Mr. WALSH. To prohibit the export of this product, of that product, and of the other product upon the ground that the public welfare might be subserved by that action. What is really in that regard for the public safety it seems to me ought to be determined by Congress rather than by the President. He can not give it the consideration that it ought to have.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, all I desire is to move to strike out the words "or welfare," in line 19, and I yield the floor.

Mr. OVERMAN. I accept that, Mr. President.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I do not rise to discuss the question immediately before the Senate, but to say a few words by way of suggestion on another subject. We have been hearing much in the last few days about the shortage of food and of hunger in this country as a result of that shortage, and hearing even much more about hunger as a possibility in other countries, especially among our allies. It is with respect to that subject I wish to make a suggestion about legislation which, it seems to me, might be worked out to advantage.

I will state what I have in mind to propose in some form. I wish I could have the real attention of Senators to this, for I want them to think about it if it is worth while thinking about. On yesterday the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] placed in the RECORD a very interesting paper about the increases in the cost of articles of food within recent months, or since the war began. We all believe—at least many believe—that these enormous increases are artificial and unwarranted. Is there any way to prevent a forced and artificial increase of the prices of food that the people must have to live? It seems to me, as evidently it seems to you, that this is a very complex and difficult question, and you have been talking about the best way to get at it. My suggestion concerns that very question.

I have this in mind: To enact a law levying an excise tax or a profits tax on wholesale and retail dealers in food products. Such a law should not apply to the producers of food products but to those who handle them as middle men, whether as wholesalers or retailers.

Can we use the taxing power of the Government legitimately and effectively to aid in remedying this great evil of excessive cost which afflicts the country? Is it possible to enact a law that would require dealers in food products, whether wholesale or retail, to make stated reports as a basis of taxation, showing the amount and kind of products handled by each and showing the cost of the various articles to the several dealers, the wastage, and so forth, the gross sum received on the sale by the wholesaler to the retailer or by the retailer to the consumer, as the case might be, and showing the profits of the business? There is where the profits tax might come in. A tax might be levied on this kind of business. If the tax should be on profits, the amount of the tax above a fixed per cent which should be exempted might as well be high enough to make excessive profits impossible and thus materially to diminish the temptation to extortion on the part of dealers.

Again, cold storage might be a good thing and of great value to the country if carried on with any decent regard for the public right and welfare. The cold storage of food products, as the business is run, is a positive public evil. Can not this evil be reached through the taxing power so as greatly to modify it? Here, too, a tax might be levied on excess profits or in some other effective way. Might not such a tax law be so framed as to make it unprofitable to hold food beyond short stated periods? It might also be made a crime for cold storage buyers—what do you think of this, Senators?—or any other buyers to destroy healthful food of any kind, and to prohibit such destruction without previous official inspection and authorization. I say this because I have been reliably informed that cold-storage managers not only take food out of their storage houses and destroy it, in order to keep up prices, but that they go out through the country and buy food products in the field or in the garden and leave them to rot. The information I have upon that subject convinces me that the statement I make is true and well founded in fact. That ought to be prevented in some way.

Mr. President, as a war measure I submit for your thought whether it would not be competent and advisable for the Government to take charge of—to commandeer, if you please—at least to supervise, cold-storage plants in the public interest, and through its agencies to collect and preserve food supplies in the public interest, the work to be done under departmental regulations. I have been trying in my feeble way to think out some practicable scheme along these lines to be submitted to the consideration of the Finance Committee when that committee shall have before it the new revenue bill, which is now being formulated by the House of Representatives. If among the Senators present there be any to whose minds this suggestion is attractive, I invite them to think about it, and if in the end they find it consistent with their judgments to approve it, to aid in formulating a provision in our tax bill, soon to be brought before the Senate, that will enable the Government to use its great taxing power to preserve the food products of the country and in a way to regulate the prices at which these products shall be offered to the consumers of the country, and to prevent undue extortion from them. I ask you, Senators, to think about this and see if we can not work out something worth while along these lines. I have brought this matter before you merely as a suggestion. I want you to think about it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Chamberlain	Gallinger	Johnson, Cal.
Bankhead	Culberson	Gronna	Jones, N. Mex.
Beckham	Curtis	Hale	Jones, Wash.
Borah	Dillingham	Hardwick	Kellogg
Brandegee	Fall	Hitchcock	Kendrick
Broussard	Fernald	Hollis	King
Calder	France	Husting	Lodge

McCumber	Poindexter	Simmons	Townsend
McKellar	Pomerene	Smith, Ga.	Vardaman
New	Reed	Smoot	Wadsworth
Norris	Saulsbury	Sterling	Walsh
Overman	Shafroth	Stone	Warren
Page	Sheppard	Sutherland	Watson
Phelan	Sherman	Thomas	Wolcott
Pittman	Shields	Thompson

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Michigan]. He is paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. PITTMAN. The senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] requested me to state that he is absent from the Senate on official business.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I wish to again announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. HUGHES], who is detained from the Senate by illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. THOMPSON. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is detained from the Senate on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I have listened with considerable interest to the discussion upon the pending chapter of the bill. Two questions have been raised: First, the constitutionality of the sections; and, second, the policy of conferring such power. I shall discuss the first question very briefly. I am not a great constitutional lawyer, although I am learning a great deal about the Constitution which I never knew before. I may say that I have learned more about it in the last month than I ever learned in 40 years of active practice at the bar. It is my opinion that, with one slight modification made by the amendment of the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] and of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], the bill would be clearly within the constitutional power of Congress to pass.

I agree with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] that Congress has no power in the matter of exports to discriminate between the ports of the different States. It is perfectly clear, however, that the President, as the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, may close any port in the United States for military reasons. He may place mines therein, or protect them with battleships, or he may fortify them, and, in order to make the war effective, he may prohibit any one from entering or leaving those ports; but, under the power of placing an embargo, he can not select the open ports of the United States from which exports shall or shall not be made. That is a different power, but it is perfectly clear that by a simple amendment striking out the words "from such place or places" it would take from the President the power to select for other than military reasons the ports from which exports should be made. He may, for military reasons, select any ports which it is necessary to close to commerce, but the reason can not be simply that he desires exports to be made from one port in preference to another. I think the amendments of Senator NELSON or Senator LODGE should be adopted. I do not know whether or not the chairman of the committee has accepted.

Mr. OVERMAN. I had announced that I had accepted it.

Mr. KELLOGG. Very well. I am perfectly clear that within the embargo power the President could not, and undoubtedly would not, select one of the open ports of the United States as against another.

Now, as to the constitutional power of Congress to delegate to the President or any other officer the power to find whether the public safety requires an embargo upon shipments, it is my opinion, after the most careful investigation in the limited time I have had, that it is clearly within the constitutional power of Congress to confer this power upon the President. I am not going to take the time of the Senate to read authorities, for I believe the lawyers of the Senate are perfectly familiar with the long line of cases under the tariff and other regulations of the Government where such powers have been conferred. I may say, however, in passing, that from 1794 down to the present hour at different periods in times of war in this country, that power has been conferred and exercised unchallenged. Senators will bear me out when I say that the long exercise of such power has been held to be a practical construction of the provisions of the Constitution. In a very remarkable case known as the Mid-West Oil case, lately decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, the court held that the long unchallenged exercise by the President of the power to withdraw lands, although not specifically authorized by act of Congress, was a practical construction of the Constitution.

Furthermore, the authorities recognize and cite the act of 1794 as an exercise of the power which has been invoked by Congress. I find no principles laid down in the cases under the tariff provisions, including the cases read by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], which, in my mind, throw any doubt upon the doctrine that Congress may establish a policy of embargo and may leave the question of when the embargo shall become effective to be determined by a proclamation or a finding of fact to be made by the President or other public officer.

In this case we are at war. I am not one of those who believe the Constitution is suspended during war, but I am one of those who believe that Congress has the power under the Constitution to declare the principle of an embargo or leave it to the executive power to determine when the public safety requires it to do so; and when that time comes and the President, by his proclamation, establishes the fact, the law applies. Congress makes the law and lays down the principle, and the executive power brings it into being by proclamation.

I think probably that it goes to the limit of the right of Congress to delegate power, but in the complex business of this country, such as fixing rates and determining the conditions under which reciprocal tariff duties shall apply, or other business conditions which change from time to time, no great country such as ours can be governed without Congress laying down general principles and leaving it to the executive officials to find the conditions upon which the inhibition of the law shall apply.

I think, therefore, that it is clearly within the constitutional power of Congress to legislate along this line, but I would advise that the words "from such place or places" be stricken from the bill and advise against striking from the bill the words "except at such time or times." These words constitute the very essence of the bill, unless we shall declare an embargo on all commerce, for the President should find the time when the embargo should go into effect, and when the exigency passes the President should take off the embargo.

Now, as to the question of the advisability of such a law, I am convinced from what has been said upon this floor that the time has come when we ought to give the President—or at least some authority, such as the Council of National Defense or some other body created by Congress—the power to place an embargo on tin plate if the facts warrant it. It seems to be stated here and uncontradicted, so far as I have heard, that the occasion has arisen when an embargo should be placed upon the export of tin plate, and I am ready to vote to confer upon the President or the Council of National Defense this power, so that he or the council may find the facts and place a limitation or embargo upon such exports, if necessary.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Lest it should go out to the country that there is no denial of the statement of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] in relation to the tin-plate situation, I call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota to the fact that the Secretary of Agriculture, in what I think is emphatic language, has denied the existence of the condition. I call the Senator's attention, merely in passing, to page 11 of part 1 of the hearings before the Agricultural Committee, which I believe took place on or about the 23d of April. I make that statement simply in the interest of accuracy, and I will have something to say about it in my own time.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I have been told that the Secretary of Agriculture has had occasion to modify that statement somewhat, although I do not know that that is the case.

Mr. KELLOGG. I thank the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] for calling my attention to the statement. The testimony to which the Senator refers, I believe, was read by one of the Senators on the floor this morning, and after that the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] read a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, which was of a later date, in which the Secretary advised the passage of this clause of the bill. I assume the Secretary either changed his mind or else he was not speaking particularly with reference to tin plate.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, just a word, if the Senator will allow me to interrupt him.

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PAGE. At the very time the Secretary of Agriculture made the statement which has been quoted this morning, he advised the passage of this bill.

Mr. KELLOGG. Well, I do not state it as a fact——

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not think there is any question at all but that Mr. Secretary Houston is quite willing that Congress should confer this power upon him; indeed, I think his recommendations are on file with the Agricultural Committee to the effect that he favored practically giving complete control of the food supply of the United States to his department. There are very few men who are not willing to take on power of that sort, and there are very few who do not think themselves quite capable of managing the business of other men and of the country better than the other men and the country manage their own business.

But the point I make, if the Senator will pardon me, is that the fact of supreme necessity was denied by the Secretary in the hearings, although in the same hearings he expressed a desire to have this power conferred. However, I do not want to interrupt the Senator further than that.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I do not say that the exigency has arisen to call for a total embargo on tin plate. All I do say is, that very strong statements have been made by Senators upon this floor that lead me to believe that there is quite a probability that such an embargo should be imposed, and with that series claim, although I will admit is has been denied, I am willing to confer that power upon the Council of National Defense or upon the President, and have the question examined, and, if it is necessary and advisable for the interest of this country to prohibit the export of tin plate, to do so.

But, Mr. President, the question goes further than that. Are we prepared now, without further information, to confer upon the President the absolute power at any time to place an embargo upon all the commerce of this country? I hesitate, Mr. President, to confer that power without further information. I should like very much to have the officials of this Government point out to me or to give us some information that there is likely to arise in the near future a necessity which will call upon us to exercise the extraordinary power of an embargo.

Mr. President, I admit that it may become necessary to place an embargo upon some articles of foodstuffs or of other manufacture in this country. While I do not believe we should become hysterical or overexcited, I do believe that it is fair to say that a grave situation confronts the belligerent nations of the world, including ourselves. I do not believe—although I think it should be stated with very great caution by public men—that the destruction of production, the extraordinary droughts in Argentina and in this country last year, the curtailment of the labor of the world, together with some artificial and other conditions, are producing a degree of scarcity and an enormous increase in prices which are threatening the prosperity, if not the strength, of the great allied nations to-day. I do believe that while we should not rush to ill-advised legislation, and while we should not attempt by ill-considered legislation to upset the normal business conditions of the country, we should give the most careful consideration to conserving the food supply, reducing the cost, and bringing it within the means of the great mass of the people of this country.

Whether there is a scarcity of food or not, there is a price to-day which makes many articles of necessity practically prohibitive to a large class of people who have small incomes. I do believe, however, that ordinarily in time of war the best course is for the people to go on with their employments in the usual, ordinary way, and not to upset and disturb the normal business conditions any more than is absolutely necessary.

I am not prepared to say at this time, even with the threatened scarcity of provisions and high prices to-day, that it is wise to place an absolute embargo on all the exportation of farm products of this country, which might be done if we should vest that power in one man, or even in the Defense Board. I am ready, however, if the time comes, to vote to place such an embargo upon the exportation from this country of foodstuffs or some articles of foodstuffs or manufactured articles if it will make for the benefit of all the people of this country.

I know it has been said that the farmers are getting high prices. They are not, however, getting all the high prices that the people are paying, and the price of wheat and flour and many other products to-day is not all going to the farmer by any manner of means. I believe it is a very big question. We should bring to bear upon it with coolness and deliberation all the intelligence and business capacity of the people in order that this question of marketing products of the farmer may be solved.

There is a wastefulness and extravagance in it, and there are undoubtedly in many places unreasonable profits extorted, by speculation and otherwise; but we should go into this subject with the greatest thoroughness and care. I believe we can bring the producer and consumer nearer together, so that we will eliminate the speculative feature and eliminate the useless waste and extravagance in marketing, and reduce the price of food without reducing the profits of the farmer.

Mr. BORAH. Evidently the Senator has given much consideration to this question. How will you bring the producer and consumer together with reference to meat products, for instance, so long as the conditions prevail in this country which do prevail with reference to the packing establishments?

Mr. KELLOGG. Well, Mr. President, I do not know but that there will have to be some legislation on that subject. I did not start out to discuss a complete remedy to-day for all high prices and for the evils of our marketing system. I will say this, however: Take it right in my own State, in the city of Minneapolis. The mills were unable to transfer wheat from one elevator in Minneapolis to their mills this winter because they could not get the cars for the transportation, and they were compelled to go into the market and buy, at any price, grain on track to take the place of that which they had stored in their elevators. This illustrates the want of facilities which has added to the cost of distribution.

Now, what I say is this: We should not pass any ill-advised legislation that will destroy the market of the farmer in this country for his products. We may be compelled to place an embargo on some foodstuffs, and I am willing to admit that to-day the price of many articles of necessity is absolutely prohibitive to a great many people in this country. I was very much interested in the statement of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] on the question of making available for cultivation the arid lands and certain Indian reservations. Allow me to remark, merely in passing, that in my own State we have millions of acres of land, the richest productive land in the country, which to-day is useless because of flood conditions on the Red Lake and the great Red River of the North. We have been unable to get this Government to even make a survey which will demonstrate what must be done to bring that vast area into production, but as these rivers are navigable streams and within the jurisdiction of the Government, we are powerless, although I notice that we passed a bill carrying an appropriation of $10,500,000 for flood control; still we have been unable to get the small sum necessary to procure a survey, and the report of the Government officials is that it will be too expensive, yet it would cost only a few thousand dollars.

Mr. President, we must bring our vast domain into cultivation, we must conserve our resources, use our arid lands and our overflowed lands. There is plenty of land in this country to produce all of the products necessary for this country and to carry on the war.

But I did not start to discuss this subject. I should like, before voting to confer this extraordinary power, some statement that it will probably be necessary to place an embargo on any article of commerce beyond tin plate. I am ready to vote to give the power to-day for that article or any other article that there is any immediate prospect of a necessity to place an embargo upon, but I should like to hear from the Senator in charge of the bill whether there is such a necessity or the probability of such a necessity. Mr. President, I think we should, as far as possible, avoid the necessity of personal government. This is, or should be, a government of law. I have voted to confer upon the Central Government and upon the President all the powers which have been asked, and I am going to vote to confer all the power which shall be asked within the bounds of reason in order to carry on this war. I am not going to question hypercritically whether that power is necessary or not. I think we should back the President and the administration with all the influence and the power and the resources of this country; and while we should, of course, preserve all the constitutional rights of the people which it has taken years to develop, we should not be too technical or too sparing in the exercise of our power in this hour of national peril. We should not haggle about power. We should confer it wherever it will be beneficial or necessary for the preservation of the life of the United States that we may work out our own great destiny under this great democracy, but we should preserve the principles of our Constitution, which the experience of ages has demonstrated are necessary to human freedom.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In order to keep the record of the proceedings, without objection, on page 25, line 22, the words "and from such place or places" will be stricken from the section.

Mr. OVERMAN. Also, on line 19, the word "welfare."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That has been stricken out; and at the end of section 1——

Mr. OVERMAN. I will wait until the Senator from Minnesota comes in. Perhaps he wishes to perfect that amendment. I will not accept it now. I will let him offer his amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, however unpopular it may be to make a speech on this question at this late time, I am going to venture upon a few remarks. I anticipate, from the current of the debate, that I shall speak on a very unpopular side of the question.

I have never seen a sudden emergency when the best and wisest of those who happen to be present were not for the moment, at least, thrown off their feet. Nearly always in his anxiety to serve each is ready to suggest a remedy. No man has ever had an ache or pain and made it known who has not experienced the felicity of being immediately prescribed for by all who have heard of his ailment; usually the number and variety of the prescriptions is exactly the same as the number who have heard of the disorder. Whenever there is an important event affecting the whole public, millions of busy brains are ready with suggestions. Every crossroads philosopher brings forth his own patent remedy, warranted to produce instant cure. Every country newspaper editor can in a few minutes indite an editorial that blazes a clear path through the forest of difficulties, while the sagacity of the great city editor is only equaled by his generous willingness to impart advice.

In the particulars referred to the men mentioned are not worse than those found in legislative halls. Like the others, when a great emergency is suddenly thrust upon us we get excited. We all want to help, but as we are often without accurate knowledge regarding the causes or extent of the danger, we are very prone to accept the first remedy proposed. Thus we are likely to do more harm than good. At this time the favorite device on the part of the press, on the part of the people, on the part of Congress, and especially on the part of the Senate, is to unload the whole difficulty, the power, and the responsibility upon the President.

It does not make any difference what the proposition is; inevitably the solution that is most popular is to pass it on to the President. If it is a matter of suppressing trusts and monopolies, we are invariably asked to confer upon the President some additional power to appoint some additional board, and to have that board deal with the proposition. Likewise, if it is a question pertaining to the national defense, the demand vehemently is made, "Put the responsibility on the President." Only to-day I have heard it stated upon this floor that the President is the Commander in Chief of the Army, and as such wholly responsible for the conduct of the war, and therefore that all power should be conferred upon the President.

Mr. President, a part of that statement is true and a part of of it is not true. The President of the United States is the Commander in Chief of the Army, and a grave responsibility rests upon him as the Commander in Chief of the Army; but it is not true that upon the President rests the sole responsibility for the war or for its conduct; upon the Congress of the United States rests a grave responsibility which it can not escape and which it can not pass over to the President. The Constitution expressly provides that Congress shall have power to (a) declare war; (b) grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water; (c) to raise and support armies; (d) to provide and maintain a navy; (e) to make rules for the government of the land and naval forces; (f) to call forth the militia to suppress insurrections and repel invasions; (g) to provide for arming and disciplining the militia. So far as I am concerned, I do not intend to shirk the responsibility resting upon me or to attempt to escape it by passing that responsibility over to the President. I shall, within the limits of my intelligence, perform my share of the great task before us.

Mr. President, never has there been in the history of this world a critical condition but there came forward men proposing the most extraordinary remedies. Frequently the remedies proposed will aggravate the evils sought to be corrected. I fear some of the "curealls" now being pressed may kill oftener than cure. I grant you that if men engage in forestalling the market, if they engage in conspiracies to artificially raise prices by combinations, such men ought to be prosecuted to the limit of the law. Nothing could be more wicked than to pursue such practices at a time like this. I would prosecute such men because they are interfering with the natural law of supply and demand, but while I am prosecuting them as felons because they seek to interfere with the natural law of supply and demand I would be very careful as a Member of Congress not to myself interfere with the same law of supply and demand, lest I by legislation should work the exact evils produced by combinations.

I appeal to Members of the Senate to pause and think. We are liable here so to legislate as to destroy the very prosperity we hope to promote, and we are liable to reduce the very production the increase of which we all recognize may be vital to our country and to half the world. We may make a mistake that will be absolutely fatal; that will upset all the business of the country; that will reduce the productivity of the land, so that instead of expanding our resources in such a way as to be able to meet the demands of the world we shall only have crippled business by an ill-advised and ill-timed interference with it.

Before we can solve any question we must determine what it is. Accordingly I inquire what is the great question now confronting our people? I affirm that the great question is not one of high prices or of low prices. It is not one of profits or of losses. The one great problem that confronts the world to-day is that of increased production.

Let us stick one pin there, and let me appeal to Senators for their attention upon this matter. I may be mistaken, but if I be not mistaken we are all liable to make a very great mistake by enacting some of this proposed legislation. The question, I say, is one of production, and coupled with that, of course, is the question of delivery, for there is no use in producing if you can not deliver.

If we could double the wheat production of the United States, so that our crop next year would be two bushels where it was one last year, and deliver the wheat, the question of a wheat shortage in the world would be over. If we could double the production of corn and deliver it, the question of a corn shortage would be over. If we could double the production of steel and copper and tools and implements, all the difficulties with reference to all those great necessities would be over. If we could double this production, not only would the danger of a world famine or world shortage be over, but the question of excessive prices would instantly be solved. Manifestly if we should this year produce twice as much wheat as we did last year, the price of wheat must, in obedience to the law of supply and demand, come down. The 5-cent loaf of bread will come back to the poor man's table just as soon as the world's supply of wheat equals the world's demand. In like manner, if we could double the production of hogs the price of pork would come down. If we could double the production of beef, the price of beef would come down. If we could double the production of steel, the price of steel would come down. So that, after all is said and done, it seems to me that the one great question that we have to meet to-day is the question of production.

Now, Mr. President, let me examine that for just a moment. Is it not true as an axiom that certainty of profit means certainty of production? Is it not as true as any one thing in this world can be that if every man knows that in a certain business he can certainly make profit, that business will be crowded to the limit? Is it not true, now—applying it more concretely—that if every farmer in the United States knew at this moment that he could sell his corn next fall for $1 a bushel, and probably more, but certainly that much, every farmer in the United States would plant to corn every acre of ground that he could cultivate and harvest? Is it not true that if every cotton planter in the United States knew that he could sell his cotton for 30 cents a pound he would crowd every acre of his plantation with cotton that he could get hands to plant and pick? Is it not true that if the manufacturers of steel knew that they could make 100 per cent profit within the next year many of them would unhesitatingly expand their plants and multiply their production? These propositions surely argue themselves. They can hardly be denied.

The chief difficulty in the way of increased production is found in the uncertainty of the reward. Let us apply that by illustration. Assume that one of the Members of the Senate is a steel manufacturer and that he has a plant which is now running to its utmost capacity and is making him splendid profits. He knows that dealing within the limits of the capacity of that plant he is going to make considerable money in the next 12 months. He will crowd that business to the utmost. But now assume that he is asked to double his plant, and in order to double that plant he must first build out of materials at a very high price, with labor commanding a very high price, and he must buy his raw materials or contract for them at a very high price. This man may do that; he is likely to do it, provided, having surveyed the industrial and commercial field, he sees such a condition as will warrant him in believing that high prices will continue long enough for him to recoup on his investment.

Mr. President, every element of uncertainty you introduce, every element of doubt you introduce, tends to deter that man from making that investment. If his profits depend upon a war liable to end at any time and so end his profits, he will hesitate. So also if his profits may be, under the authority of a statute of the United States, suddenly terminated, he will hesitate. Accordingly I inquire whether we are not in danger of creating a condition which will cause the man in my illustration to say, "I guess I will not build this mill this year; I can judge what the market may be; I may guess what the supply and demand will be; I may speculate in regard to profits with some degree of certainty; but as my market may be suddenly closed by the mandate of some statutory board, I can not afford to take that chance, hence I will not built the plant. Observe, if the illustration be true, we may cut off production at its source.

Now, there is a danger here, Senators, a danger so great that we can not afford to disregard it. If I wanted to solve this, the world's difficulty, to-day and were to follow the light of my own reason without suggestion from anybody, and were given unlimited power, I think I would be more inclined to guarantee profits than to threaten with loss. I think I would rather guarantee to the cattle raiser and the farmer certain minimum prices than to fill them with fear of ruin by the decree of some man denying them access to the markets of half the world. I think I would rather guarantee a minimum price to the manufacturer of these great products that we must have to carry on the war than to paralyze him with fear lest he be ruined by the arbitrary act of a board or of a single officer. I would do that if I did anything. But let me tell you when you undertake to go very far in interfering with the laws of supply and demand you are likely to—I employ a colloquial expression—"throw a monkey wrench in the machinery," and do more harm than you do good. It is true one can sit down and can figure out how by appointing a dictator for the country and by having that dictator surround himself with wise men, and by employing the arbitrary powers of a dictator, every man, woman, and child in the country can be made to step into a certain niche and perform a certain work. Thus we might create a great industrial machine and approach that condition of efficiency which we are told exists in the German Empire to-day.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. In just a moment.

That I grant you may be done, but that is a thing, Senators, that can only be done at the end of years and years of experimentation and patient building, and when it has all been done I question whether there is not lost in individual initiative more than is gained by the system. However that is not a thing which it is possible for us to do here at this time. We are entering upon a contest the end of which, of course, we can not prophesy. I grant you that we should take all steps necessary to meet the reasonable probabilities that may present themselves in the future.

But this is the point I want to make: We must choose to-day between the promoting of the efficiency of the American people, as the American people now live and as our business is now organized, and an attempt to regulate and change that business by law. I question whether the brain of any man can now devise a plan that will not do a great deal of harm, unless the plan be merely calculated to promote the energies of the people. Certain it is that embargoes seldom promote business.

I shall gladly yield now to the Senator from Idaho if I have not gone past the point he wanted to speak upon.

Mr. BORAH. I will not interrupt the Senator now.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, what is the industrial situation in the United States to-day? Everybody nearly wants to make money. There are, of course, a few drones in the hive of human industry; but, speaking broadly and including the children, there are 104,000,000 people in the United States all striving to make some money, all striving to gain an increment of wealth. Millions of farmers are tilling their fields and applying their individual brains to the problems before them. These farmers have some sense. Do you know I am enough of a heretic to actually believe that there are this afternoon following the plow across the prairies of the great Central West, and in the South and the North and East, clad in overalls and brogan shoes, millions of men who know more about agriculture than any Secretary of Agriculture now living, in its practical application to the particular piece of ground the particular farmer is working on.

I do not speak disrespectfully of the Secretary of Agriculture. He was a college professor. I do not know whether he was born or ever lived or ever worked on a farm. I do not know what his previous condition in life may have been. I recognize him as a big, intelligent, fine gentleman; and yet I make the assertion that the average farmer in the State of Missouri or Iowa or Indiana or any other State knows more about how to make his particular piece of land pay than the Secretary of Agriculture knows or any expert he has knows. If you will just encourage that farmer with the certainty of good prices, he will solve the question of agricultural production.

Now, how are you going to encourage him? You can not much encourage him by law, but you can greatly discourage him by law. Prices are $2 for wheat or better, $1 for corn or better, about $16 for hogs, I think. I have not looked at the market reports lately. All prices are very high. The farmer knows his ground, knows what labor he can command. Insure him a continuance of prices and do you doubt he will produce all his land can be forced to bear? Give to the farmer reasonable ground to believe the prices will continue and he will solve the problem of production. I repeat, these farmers are not fools. They read the market reports, and in modern times many of them get the market reports over the telephone. He is going to sit down with his pencil and figure corn is $1 a bushel; hogs are $14, if that happens to be the price; and cattle are so much. He will calculate the capacity of his farm. He will try to figure out with these high prices how he can increase his hog product, how he can increase his corn product, how he can increase his product of cattle, and so on. Now, do not make any mistake about it. He will figure it out better than anybody living at the Capital, hundreds of miles away, can figure it for him. If you can make it certain to the farmers of the country that they are going to continue to get these high prices, then you may be sure they will plant and they will harvest.

There is another thing you can do in the way of encouragement. You might arrange in certain localities where they need seeds that they shall get them, because that helps get the seed in the ground. You might under certain conditions that are imaginable help them get their crops harvested. But there again the wages that are paid the men will get the labor, and that is about the only thing that will get the labor. You might encourage irrigation to put water on dry land, and you might help build levees to keep the water off of wet land.

I have said, and I repeat, assure these farmers good prices and they will plant, and they will reap. They will be in the field with the first faint blush of dawn. They will stay there until the last gleam of the evening is gone. They will toil and moil. They will do their work better than they will if they are interfered with by the swivel-chair farmers of the Agricultural Department at Washington.

But now tell the farmers that they are liable to have their prices cut in two by the arbitrary mandate of some board and you will very quickly find out that many will hesitate about buying seed at high prices and hiring labor at high prices and buying extra horses at high prices in order to put in more acreage. They may take the chance of drouth or floods or grasshopper or other pests natural, but they will hardly take the hazard of some individual or board some fine morning cutting off half their world market by simply issuing an edict to that effect.

Mr. President, what I am saying here about the farmer is just as true, perhaps is in a greater degree true, of other business men, for the farmer is a business man.

Mr. KENYON. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. REED. I will yield.

Mr. KENYON. I am greatly interested in the Senator's discussion and agree with him fully. I wish to suggest to the Senator that the great trouble the farmers in my State are having in handling this proposition is the question of labor—in getting labor to do the active farm work. If they can get the labor they can take care of this question of production. I was wondering in listening to the Senator if with his other good remedies he has any suggestion to make along that line.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it comes back to the question, in my humble judgment, very largely of the old law of supply and demand being again the supreme law. To make my answer a little more specific, the farmer finds it difficult to get labor. I imagine he will have to pay very high prices to get it. I think the public can do some things in the way of encouragement. I think, for instance, a patriotic agitation might lead a great many boys in the cities to go to farms and so bring some measure of help. They can not take the place of the regular farm hand, but some help would come in that way.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. It was suggested yesterday on the floor that the suspension of the literacy clause of the immigration law would aid. What does the Senator from Missouri think of that?

Mr. REED. I think of it just as I did when the bill was up, and the Senator from Montana will remember that his position and mine were the same. We held that it was a foolish thing to prohibit men coming to this country simply because they could not read or write. But that is a remedy I fear we can not get much benefit from in time for the coming harvest. The coming harvest is less than 90 days away—a good deal less than that down in the Southern States.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Nor the corn.

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator will pardon me, I am told quite recently a large number of laborers were admitted from Mexico.

Mr. REED. There is a kind of labor down there that I confess I would not want to see come in, except as a war measure.

Mr. President, there are two things I want to advert to, and then I am through. One is the tin-plate argument that we have heard here, and the other, I hope I shall not forget, is the limitation upon human intellect, and therefore the total inability of any man in the world to manage the business of this country. We have listened to an argument here this morning——

Mr. BORAH. Before the Senator goes to that subject, may I interrupt him for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator has spoken ably of the question of encouraging production, and I agree fully with him in the proposition that it would be a mistake to spread over the country such a bureaucratic system as would destroy initiative on the part of the individual citizen. I agree further with the proposition that in all probability we can not encourage production very much by law, and might discourage it considerably by law. But there are some things, it seems to me, which we ought to be able to do in this country in some way, which, would encourage production, and that is to more equitably distribute the profits of production and to establish a closer relationship between the producer and consumer.

I called attention yesterday to some institution. Let me call attention to what I have just read in the paper of this morning. The Senator will remember that the Standard Oil Co. was dissolved a few years ago and rendered into its component parts and given a supposedly respectability and deprived supposedly of the power to extort from the American people vast sums of money which it had been in previous years extorting.

I read in the papers this morning that this disorganized and demoralized institution has paid since that time $629,000,000 in dividends, disbursements since the dissolution of the company being six times the amount of its capital. To my mind it is vain to hope that the individual citizen will exercise the initiative which still belongs to him in part if he realizes that over and above it are these organized institutions which practically reap the entire fruits of his labor.

Mr. REED. The Senator, I think, was not in the Chamber when I began my remarks.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I was in my seat.

Mr. REED. Very early in my remarks I stated that every combination or conspiracy to extort unjust profits or to restrain trade ought to be punished more severely now than at any time in the history of the country. I stated that we were justified in thus punishing them, because by restraining trade and commerce they were putting a limitation upon the law of supply and demand, and we ought to be very careful when we come to enact a statute to see that we do not do by statute that which these other gentlemen are doing by conspiracy.

Mr. BORAH. I listened to the Senator's statement, and I did not disagree with him.

Mr. REED. I do not disagree with what the Senator has said now. Of course our old friend the Standard Oil——

Mr. CALDER. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. REED. In just one moment I will yield. Our old friend the Standard Oil, so far back as the ordinary man can remember, has been regularly killed off about every 10 years. The custom is to periodically hunt the Standard Oil. A great cry is raised and it spreads to all parts of the country. The hunt is on—comes the fellow with his 22-caliber Sharpe single-shot pistol, likewise the individual with the 16-inch cannon, big and little they come and hunt the Standard Oil, and they finally round it up, and then they kill it and then they bury it; and the next morning they discover that some time during the night there occurred a mysterious resurrection, and the old Standard Oil, clothed in the flesh, restored to the vigor of youth, twice as big and twice as dangerous as it ever was before, is prancing around the country looking for rivals to crush and trade territory to grab. I suppose we are about due for another attack.

I hope that some day we will have a Federal court brave enough to really dissolve one of these concerns.

Since I am led into a digression, I wish to say that I regard the decision of the court in the Standard Oil case as little more than a perpetual charter to exercise monopoly in the United States. Until that decision had been rendered it could always be claimed by the Government that the Standard Oil Co., by virtue of its organization, was a combination existing in violation of the laws of the land, and as such liable to punishment; but when the court in a case duly brought had decided that it was a monopoly, and then had decided that it should be divided in a certain way, and had laid down the exact rules by which the component parts of the concern could run, it amounted to a decree authorizing it to run in that way forever. It has been running in that way, and probably strictly within the terms of that decree, ever since, and yet it is in fact one concern and is more powerful than in the past. If it has violated the terms of the decree I should like to know the fact, because I think that the Standard Oil and similar institutions are not beneficial to our country.

But, Mr. President, that is really a little aside from the matter I am discussing. I now yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, if the Senator from Missouri will permit me, I have been a Member of this body only a few months, but I have been here long enough to realize that when the Senator from Missouri is addressing the Senate Senators should remain in their seats and listen to what he says. He talks very interestingly of the matter of the high prices of commodities. Reference has been made by the Senator from Idaho to the Standard Oil Co., and other corporations have been referred to. The Senator from Missouri referred to the possibility of our providing for some system of minimum prices so as to assure sufficient production. Perhaps that may be the remedy.

Mr. REED. The Senator misapprehended me. I did not advocate that. I said if I were going to undertake to interfere at all I would look on that more favorably than I would on the restriction of exports.

Mr. CALDER. I did not mean to infer that the Senator said it was his remedy, but under the circumstances it may be the remedy. However, Mr. President, we all agree, and the Senator explained that in detail, that no man enters a business undertaking without a reasonable assurance of profit. That applies to every industry, and, as he has pointed out, to merchants, manufacturers, and railroad men, and it applies equally to farmers. The farmer has been making money as well as the rest of the business men of the country. I know on Long Island, where I live, during the past winter he received as high as $3 a bushel for potatoes. I am informed that this year, because of the large prices of last year, it is proposed in one county alone on Long Island to raise 5,000,000 bushels of potatoes. I believe that the farmers of the country, encouraged by the high prices of 1916, will raise enough this year to prevent any shortage in food products.

But there is one thought that comes to me in listening to the Senator's discussion of this subject. I was in Washington late in November of last year and met a farmer from New York State who farms on a very large scale. I told him it was up to the farmers of the country to get into the business of planting large crops in the year 1917, so as to take care of the difficulties that were confronting the Nation. He remarked, "My friend, let me say to you that the farmer has learned his lesson from the great combinations of business in this Nation. The farmers," he continued, "are not going to grow two blades of grass where one formerly grew without some assurance of a market." I hope, as the Senator expressed himself, that the business conditions of the Nation will warrant the farmer this year in growing the two blades of grass where one grew before; but if he does not, perhaps we may have to resort to some unusual methods at least during the present crisis; but I never would agree for this Government to guarantee to any line of endeavor a minimum price for its product as an ultimate proposition. It would be so revolutionary, it seems to me, as to destroy the initiative in every line of business.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I thank the Senator. I want it to be understood that I have not been an advocate of fixing a minimum price; but I said if I were going to interfere at all in order to get a great production, which is the thing now necessary, I would interfere by offering to guarantee certain prices, so that producers would be assured against losses and possible ruin by the bottom suddenly falling out of the market. However, I think that the business men and the farmers of this country are perfectly willing to take their chances on the market, provided they are not to be arbitrarily interfered with.

This has nothing to do with combinations. I repeat that if men conspire to control the market, if men go into the business of violating the laws of the United States and undertake to extort from their fellows by artificial and by illegal means, then, of course, the law should be applied to them with all its penalties. I am arguing, however, the proposition here, as well as I am able this afternoon, that if you will simply give the brains of America and the busy hands of America a free field these great prices will stimulate production; that any danger of shortage will soon pass away.

Mr. CALDER. There is no doubt of that.

Mr. REED. I am arguing that the most dangerous thing in the world to do is to hang over the industries of this country a sort of sword of Damocles, that is liable to be dropped at any moment upon them and to destroy them.

What man is there now who would enter upon the business of doubling the capacity of his factory, taking the chances of all market conditions, of all world conditions, if he understands that, in addition to such chances, at any moment he may, by the arbitrary decree of one man, find his market restricted or taken away? I propose to argue that question for a moment, using the tin-plate argument of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD].

The Senator from Maine well illustrated the evil that will come to this country if we look at questions from the one-man viewpoint or if we undertake to give a man or a board the right to run the business of 104,000,000 people. The Senator from Maine is a canner, and naturally he wants cans in which to put his products, and would like to have plenty of them, and like to have them at reasonable prices. I assume he would not want them at anything below a reasonable price; I am sure he would not. Looking at it from that standpoint, he speedily places himself in a sort of intellectual harmony with the rest of the country in this wise: "Tin is necessary for my cans; cans are necessary for vegetables and fruits; fruits and vegetables are necessary to humanity; ergo, when I work for my cans I work for all the people of the earth." Without speaking at all of the propriety of a man introducing any amendments having special bearing upon his particular line of business, and advocating them upon the floor of the Senate, waiving that question and approaching the proposition from the broad point of view, what seems to be the fact? It appears that enough sheet metal can be made in this country to make the cans; it seems there can be enough tin imported to tin the sheet metal. It seems there are more cans being sent abroad than the Senator from Maine likes, and for his benefit and for the benefit of other canners he brings in this amendment on behalf of himself as orator and for all others who may be similarly situated.

But what is the fact? The tin will cease going abroad just as soon as they pay more money for it in this country than is paid for it abroad. If we interfere to stop the tin going abroad in order that the Senator from Maine may have plenty of it with which to make his cans with which to preserve his vegetables and fruits, then, of course, we ought to prohibit the sending abroad of the fruits or of the vegetables, because, if we continue to send them abroad, that makes the price higher in this country to all the people of this country. But if we prohibit the sending of those fruits and vegetables abroad the man who is raising the fruits and vegetables will be practically bankrupted, for he raises them on high-priced land with high-priced labor and must have a good market to live. But, Mr. President, if we are to prohibit the sending abroad of tin plate and tin cans and vegetables in order that the Senator from Maine may escape paying a high price for his tin cans, then by parity of reasoning we ought to refuse to ship anything out of this country—wheat or corn or potatoes—because by closing the European markets to them we can reduce the price to the American consumer, and the American consumer is certainly as important as the American canner. But when you reduce the price to the American consumer by stopping the shipment of corn and of wheat and of potatoes and of rye and of barley and of horses and of sheep and of cattle you have reached every farmer there is in the United States, you have cut off his profits, and you have killed the very production that you want to promote at this particular period of the world's history.

In the name of high Heaven—and I say it reverently, and not oratorically—let us have some sense here in the Senate of the United States. When you put the embargo upon the shipment of these things from this country and destroy the market for them you destroy the farmer's profits; when you have destroyed the farmer's profits you have struck the country dry-goods store and grocery store and the boot and leather merchants; when you have reached them you have reached the jobbers, and when you have reached the jobbers you have reached the manufacturers, and when you have reached the manufacturers you have reached the army of labor that they employ. All down the line the interference will be passed along until at last you find that all you have succeeded in doing, unless you proceed with the extremest care, is to have interfered with that vast army of laborers, commonly called the American people, whose busy hands and busy brains are ready to toil, provided you give to them a certainty of recompense and an opportunity to labor.

Of course, if as this great stream of commerce flows by it is obstructed by dams built by wicked men, then the obstructions should be removed. I am not arguing that question. I am, with all the earnestness of my soul, arguing against a proposition that will interfere with the industries of the country and that will have a tendency to frighten people and to make them draw back from investment and from business adventure.

A little while ago Mr. Coffin, who is a member, I believe, of a board appointed by the President known as the National Council of Defense, made a trip west, and then came back and warned us. He said already these threats of interference, these threats of seizure, and threats of change of habits are disrupting the business of the country. Why should they not? Why will it be insisted that business men—and by "business men" I mean all men who are engaged in production, who have to invest their money or to invest their time and their brains upon a future market—why will it be insisted that the way to encourage them to invest is to hang over them the danger that an autocratic board clothed with autocratic power may at any moment take away that which they have produced?

That brings me, Mr. President, to a question of some delicacy, which I want to discuss with all frankness, and I hope without misunderstanding. I said in the opening of my remarks that everybody nowadays wants, when a difficult problem is presented, to say, "Pass it on to the President." Upon the President's devoted back has been tied not the sins but many of the responsibilities of the Congress.

When we say that a certain provision of law shall go into effect when the President shall find that the public safety requires, and so forth, we are wont to believe that the President will apply his great brain to that particular task. When we say that the President shall have authority to do this great work and that great work, we all are wont to think that the President will personally and individually perform that work. We have given the President enough jobs of this kind so that if he could transform himself into a physical Hercules, as he is already an intellectual Hercules, and then could subdivide himself into a hundred parts he could not personally perform the tasks. How does he proceed, and how must he proceed? He must proceed through human agencies, through men whom he selects. Who are the men he selects? Are they any wiser because the President selects them than they would be if the people selected them? Are they any more patriotic than they would be if the people selected them? If, indeed, they are wiser and more patriotic we had better change the form of our government, and authorize the President in all instances to appoint all the officers. But that is not the theory of our Government, and it is not the philosophy we have quite accepted up to this date. Our theory is that when the people pick their own servants, they will pick the most patriotic and the wisest. Accordingly, when they pick the President of the United States and take him from private life and put him in that great office, we honor him because the people put him there. And so some little modicum of honor used to be ascribed to those who sit in this Chamber or those who sit in the House of Representatives, but latterally the view seems to be to hold that if men are in Congress they can not by any possibility know much, so that when a difficult question arises they are to "pass it on to the President," who, in turn, will pass it on to somebody else.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Pass it on to a Secretary, who will pass it on to a chief of division.

Mr. REED. Yes. Now, who are these somebodys else? Gentlemen picked from private life, some of them men of ability—I pass no criticism on them, but they are merely men. If they were Members of this body they would not be able to stand on the floor for a moment and preamble their utterances, "Thus saith the Lord"; their words would be given no more weight than would be given the words of other Members.

I have heard Senators here recently quoting the Secretary of War. They say "the Secretary of War says thus and so." I speak this now in all kindness, for I have the utmost respect for the Secretary of War; but why quote the Secretary of War? You would think to hear the obsequious tones of these gentlemen as they speak of the Secretary of War that he traced his ancestry back through an unbroken line of distinguished warriors to the first great world conqueror, Alexander the Great, and that he had been all his life engaged in the study of great military problems; whereas, on the contrary, he was the mayor of a splendid city out in Ohio. He was a lawyer in good practice, a gentleman of ability and distinction, who probably, when he took the office of Secretary of War, knew as little of matters military as any Member of either branch of Congress. With a good brain and with some advantage of position, he has, of course, increased his learning, and for him I have the utmost respect. I speak of him in this way because he furnishes a good example of my contention, for in recent days we have been a great deal quoting the Secretary of War. We have a Secretary of the Navy——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Missouri, because I understand that he has had personal experience along that line, whether he has not found that the office of mayor cultivates fighting qualities which are desirable in a Secretary of War?

Mr. REED. It does; but not that particular kind of fighting qualities that will lead anybody to mobilize an army for the trenches or to incur any great physical hazard.

We have a Secretary of the Navy, a splendid gentleman and, I trust, a particular friend of mine. I served with him on the Democratic national committee; we went through a campaign together; I have spoken with him from the same platform; I admire him; I have never been one of those who have criticized him. I think he has done many splendid things as Secretary of the Navy—magnificent things—but he was a newspaper man down in North Carolina. He, of course, has had four years' experience now in his great office, and a smart man will acquire a great deal of knowledge in that time; but there are Members of this body, though, perhaps, not present at this moment in the Chamber, who have had wide experience. There sits here an ex-Secretary of State, a distinguished man. In this Chamber there are those who served their time upon the Federal bench and have been retired. Here are other men who have been leaders in their professions, and so on. What I am pointing to is the fact that these agencies selected by the President—and I have named two, at the head of the War and of the Navy, simply as illustrations—are merely men, and they are just as liable to be mistaken as any one of the Members of this body; their judgment is just as liable to be in error, and this task which you are constantly putting on the President will necessarily be turned over to some one of the members of the Cabinet or directly to some board. When it comes to the member of the Cabinet, what does he do? He has a great deal of business upon his hands. He has many great problems. He must act through subordinates, and he appoints somebody or he calls on somebody to do the work.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I will yield to the Senator in just a moment. He may call on the Civil Service Commission, who will certify the last fellow who passed the examination or the fellow at the head of the list. He may call upon some Senator or Representative to recommend somebody to him; he may pick somebody that he himself knows; but he has obtained a man now that probably could not get into either branch of Congress. That man calls somebody else in, and at the end they make up a finding of some sort that goes up in its routine way to the member of the Cabinet, and the member of the Cabinet certifies it up to the President, and that busy man, burdened and weighted down by the cares of the world, has to sign his name frequently as a matter of form. He can not, in the nature of things, give attention to all matters.

Now, Mr. President, that brings me to this: You propose under those circumstances to turn over the management of the business of the United States to some one or two or three individuals of the character I was discussing a moment since, and take it out of the hands of the people of the United States. There was never a graver mistake made by any legislative body.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. OVERMAN. Would not the same argument the Senator is now making apply to the President himself? He has had no naval or military experience. He is compelled to perform much of his work through other officers of the Government and give his opinion as to their recommendations. I do not know whether or not he could be elected to the Senate of the United States, but we have to trust these things to somebody, and the people have selected him to execute the affairs of this country.

Mr. REED. They have? I thought they selected a House of Representatives and a Senate to do part of the business of this country.

Mr. OVERMAN. I said "to execute."

Mr. REED. Yes. Well, we are not now talking about execution; we are now talking about passing laws in this body that will grant remarkable power to some board or some individual that we should ourselves exercise. I am not saying that there should not be any power given. It seems to me the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] about hits the nail on the head, but I am protesting now against this proposal of allowing some one to say whether the people of this country can ship their goods abroad and how the people of this country shall do their business. Of course when it comes to shipping goods to a nation that is at war with us or shipping goods to nations that will in turn send them to a nation at war with us, that is clearly within the military authority. It is a plain question that should be determined in each instance upon its merits. That is not difficult; but when you propose to write into a bill language which authorizes an embargo to be placed upon the commerce of the United States whenever the President shall deem it for the public welfare, when you undertake to employ any of the "patent-medicine cure-alls" that have been suggested here within the past few days, when you undertake to regulate the business of the United States, you make a great mistake. Against that I protest.

Mr. President, I have sat upon committees of the Senate considering bills affecting some particular business when a representative of that business would come before the committee and in five minutes' time would disclose to us that the proposed legislation was altogether wrong or that it was in some respects erroneous. What has that to do with the question I am discussing? I answer that that illustrates the fact that the men engaged in running the business of this country know more about how to run their business, how to conduct it safely, how to make it pay, how to make it expand, than any individual sitting in the Capitol at Washington can know. We can carry this matter of interference to a point where the interference is destructive; and we must not do it.

Why, I remember there was a distinguished gentleman on the Federal Trade Commission who sent out a letter asking for opinions upon a rule which the Federal Trade Commission proposed to put into force. The commission proposed, according to his suggestion, to adopt a uniform system of bookkeeping and to make every man engaged in business in the United States conform to it. He wrote me for my opinion, and I said to him, "I had something to do with the Federal Trade Commission law; I opposed it in many particulars; I think I know what is in it, but I confess I know of no clause in it that will permit the Federal Trade Commission to undertake to set up a bookkeeping system for the business men of the United States. There is no authority for you to teach bookkeeping or to establish classes in law, in medicine, or in theology. I respectfully suggest that I am old-fashioned enough to believe that the business man who runs even a country grocery store knows better how to keep the accounts of his business in that little store that he built up and created than some wise man sitting at Washington knows."

We must not make the mistake of destroying the production of the United States by interfering with it. It seems to me that the whole problem before us is to do everything we can to prevent combination, to prevent cornering of products or of prices, to do everything we can to stimulate production; and the best way to stimulate production, I repeat, is to bring about a certainty, or as nearly as possible a certainty, of profits. Then let these busy brains of our business men that are working night and day continue to work with problems that are the usual commercial problems, and do not inject into the equation the uncertainty of the arbitrary action of some man or some board at Washington which may at any minute interfere with their calculations.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. By cutting off their markets.

Mr. REED. Yes.

What is the proposition that will confront those people? Suppose, sir, that I am engaged in the business of manufacturing steel. Suppose that I know there is a market over there in Europe; that that market has a demand of approximately a certain amount; that the possible supply is approximately a certain amount. I can figure then that there is a market there for so many million pounds of steel, and I can figure approximately what the prices will be; and, thus figuring, I may be able to convince myself that it is proper to buy an iron mine at even a large price, to build a mill even at a large cost, to hire labor even at high wages, to buy ships even at excessive and unusual costs, and yet that I can make money. But if you say to me, after I have done all this, that at any moment that market may be taken away from me, will I, as a sensible man, make those investments?

Now, Mr. President, these patented remedies are not new. They have been made in nearly every great trouble that has arisen in the world's history. Efforts have been made to cut down the value of money and force it upon people by statute, but it never succeeded. They have tried to regulate the price of foods, but it has never entirely succeeded. Perhaps to a slight extent it can be made to succeed for a limited period of time when backed by a sufficient number of bayonets. We have not yet reached the point when it is necessary to come to these supreme sacrifices, and to undertake them at this time will only interfere with the business of this land.

I repeat what I said a minute ago—that when you undertake to create an embargo upon shipments abroad, one of the first men to be affected will be the farmer. People say, "It costs a great deal of money to live in town. Potatoes are too high, meat is too high, and consequently we will stop shipping abroad." When you say that and do that, the farmer's profits are cut off, and instantly his injury flows back through all the lines of trade until everybody is affected. We can not afford to make a mistake about these matters.

Mr. President, if the United States of America were surrounded as Germany is surrounded to-day; if our people were in that state of consternation which would result if every avenue of escape were cut off; if our men were in the trenches by the millions, and their maimed bodies were being carried home every day, and their dead bodies were being corded in the trenches or burned on funeral pyres; if this fearsome state existed, when the very desperation of the situation would demand from everybody a supreme effort and inspire every soul to the highest possible effort, almost every imaginable kind of interference might be justifiable. The taking over of all the property of all the citizens might become justifiable, and the mobilization into one vast industrial army of every noncombatant might be justifiable; it might be necessary. But such, sir, is not the situation now confronting us. We have here a country enormous in extent, its resources incalculable. It is organized to-day by the individual brain and energy of its multitude of people. It is pursuing certain paths. It is producing certain results. Those policies and this course of living have made us the richest Nation of earth, and now we are suddenly confronted with a war abroad. What is the best thing to do under the circumstances?

It has been decreed that we will loan money in enormous amounts to our allies. In order to raise that money, we must promote our own prosperity. We must not kill it. Everything that makes for the prosperity of this country is essential to the floating of those great loans. Business should not be frightened. Farmers should not be alarmed. The people of the land should not be led to believe that there is any sudden lurch to be given to business. Everything should be done to encourage the people, to inspire them with confidence, to give them to understand that every man who engages in labor and every man who engages in honest investment is nearly certain of a just return. All this that you may float your loans. If you would float your loans, do not destroy business.

The next thing necessary is to raise troops. We have settled that, and our troops are to be raised by draft. That question is behind us, except the labor of the draft and the heartaches that will come—all that we must endure. That draft will interfere with the labor conditions of this country to some extent. Taking these men out of their various employments is going to make it harder for the business man; it is going to make it harder for the farmer; it is going to make it harder for every man that employs labor. So we must minimize that as much as we can; but we can not minimize it by threatening the man who must fill the gaps created by the draft with the destruction of his business through the arbitrary cutting off of his foreign trade. On the contrary, we must give him assurance, as far as we can, of a continuance of profits, so that he can hire green men and train them at a cost to himself, or even put women in the place of the men who are let out of the factories. That is the way we must take care of that situation.

Then will come the question of the production on the farms; and that is the big question after all. I repeat what I said a few moments ago—I can not repeat it too often, because in my judgment it is the eternal truth—that the best way to get farms planted in this country, the best way to get more wheat for people to eat, more corn, more cotton to clothe them, more meat for their stomachs, is to assure the farmer a great profit; and you can not assure that profit by telling him that at any moment his foreign market may be cut off. They all know enough to know that if you cut off the foreign market for six months' time the price of cotton and of wheat and of cattle and of horses will come down enormously. Convince the farmer that that is going to happen to him, and you may be sure that he will only plant that which he knows he can plant and harvest with his own hands, without incurring the danger of hiring high-priced men to do the cropping for him.

Oh, yes; there will be somebody on his feet in a minute with a remedy. He can tell us just exactly how to fix this thing. But, Mr. President, let no man incautiously interfere with that vastest and most intricate machine in all the world, the great industrial machine that has a million brains that think; a million eyes that see; a million pairs of hands to feel and grasp; a million stomachs to fill, that must always produce because it always must consume; that can not stop lest it starve, and so must always be kept in condition to never stop. That is the most intricate machine there is in the world. You had better let it alone. God Almighty created it, and under His providence men have been running it. Make no mistake; all are affected when one is injured. You can not interfere for the tin-can industry without interfering for other industries. You can not interfere with other industries without affecting the tin-can business, and so on.

What is the problem? The answer to it all is, Keep business going; and when I say "business," I mean everything, from the man who works with the shovel in the street to the man who stands back of the counter in the greatest bank of the land. Keep these men employed. Keep on making things. Make automobiles and send them to Europe. Make tin plate and send it to Europe. Make plows and send them to Europe, if there is any place they can use them. Make locomotives and send them to Europe, and all the time be making money and keeping it in America; and then turn around and loan it to our allies and help them win this war, and use some of it to produce for ourselves the finest cannon that the skill of man can produce and the greatest war vessels that can be created to plow the deep.

We must not apply quack remedies to the business ills of the land. Nor should we apply similar methods to the newspapers of the country. If we ever establish a press censorship, we are likely to have an individual who never was able to establish a paper that had a circulation of 500, or that was not under a mortgage every minute from the time it was created until the time it died, appointed to manage all the great newspapers of the country.

I know that newspapers do lots of provoking things. Of course they do. I get mad at them every day. They have never half appreciated me. [Laughter.] You never saw a newspaper man yet who could not tell you exactly how to do anything better than anybody else ever did it, from the writing of an ode to spring to the conduct and strategy of a great war. I commend to every newspaper man on earth the reading of that delightful story, How Private George W. Peck Put Down the Rebellion. [Laughter.] But, Mr. President, the aggregate and sum total of it all is this, that these great organs, spreading the views of first one man and then another, carryng the news of the world to all the other brains, are the vastest force there is in the world for intellectual and moral advancement and for the physical well-being of our race.

I believe there ought to be some laws passed that will make it possible to reach that newspaper man who prefers to have a "scoop" in his newspaper to having our Army win a battle. There are such men, possibly, in the business—by which I mean only to say that I believe it is entirely proper to pass a law here that will punish the exposition of military secrets and an interference with the plans of our Army and Navy in that respect. But, sir, I refuse to give my consent to a law, by whomsoever proposed—whether it comes here with the odor of sanctity about it, or whether it shall have fallen from the profane hand of an ordinary Senator—that will place an embargo upon information, upon freedom of speech, and freedom of the press, and the right of peaceable assemblage.

It is not necessary that we should thus copy Prussia. It is a singular thing that forming here in line as the torchbearers of democracy, holding aloft banners inscribed with legends to human liberty, it is proposed, before we take a single step forward in that great enterprise that we shall abandon all of the principles the fathers taught, all the great fundamentals of our democratic union, and that we shall adopt as our maxims the infamous principles of the infamous Government against which we make war to-day, upon which we make war because it has made war upon humanity, upon God's laws and man's rights.

I decline to Prussianize America. I say it is a wholly unnecessary thing to do. Better than a Prussianized army is an army of free men. Better than an army that moves forward in obedience to the brutal command of a master who goads it on with the sword of despotism is an army that moves in response to an inspiration of love of country and of justice and of right. Better than the solid phalanx that moves in obedience to one will, but moves forward blindly, is that other phalanx that moves forward as a unit in obedience to a love of man and a service of God. Better the army of democracy than the army of autocracy.

This war can be fought and won, and it will be won, but it shall not be won at the expense of the liberties of the American people. Nay; rather, as we emerge from its clouds into the sunlight of peace, let us come as an army of democracy which never repudiated a single article of the creed of liberty. Let us come as an army of free men fighting as free men. Let us come as free men who entered as free men and who, through the storm and battle, remained always as free men. On the banners of our Army and our Nation let there never be spot or stain of despotism.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the argument of this question has gone very far afield. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] this morning eloquently spoke of the volunteers from Tennessee fighting the Battle of Kings Mountain. I reminded him that there was no such State as Tennessee when that battle was fought. I reminded him also that if we called Tennesseeans all the men across the mountains where Tennessee is to-day there were more North Carolinians and Virginians in that fight than there were Tennesseeans.

I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a short extract from HENRY CABOT LODGE'S work, The Story of the Revolution, showing that the man who commanded in that battle was a Virginian—Mr. Campbell. The general was Gen. McDowell, from North Carolina. Being a very aged man, and feeling incompetent to command on that occasion, he chose Campbell to fight the battle. Campbell and Cleaveland, of North Carolina, and Shelby and Sevier fought the battle. There were no Tennesseeans there, but there were about 300 under Shelby from the territory now called Tennessee. There were over 400 from the State of North Carolina. There were 500 from the old State of Virginia. I wanted this history put into the RECORD so that the truth might be told.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

They all assembled at the Sycamore Shoals, on the Watauga, on September 25. Four hundred of the Virginians came under William Campbell, 500 from the more southern settlement under Shelby and Sevier, and 160 refugees under McDowell, of North Carolina. The next day they started, after a stern and old Presbyterian minister had prayed and asked a blessing upon them. They gathered in an open grove, and, leaning on their rifles, these backwoodsmen and wild Indian fighters bowed their heads and listened in silence to the preacher who blessed them and called upon them to do battle and smite the foe with the sword of the Lord and Gideon.

Then they set out, a strange-looking army, clad in buckskin shirts and fringed leggings, without a tent, a bayonet, or any baggage, and with hardly a sword among the officers. But every man had a rifle, a knife, and a tomahawk, and they were all mounted on wiry horses. Discipline in the usual military sense was unknown, and yet they were no ordinary militia. Every man was a fighter, bred in Indian wars, who had passed his life with horse and rifle, encompassed by perils. They were a formidable body of men—hardy, bold to recklessness, and swift of movement. They pushed on rapidly over the high table land covered with snow, and then down the ravines and gorges—rough riding, where there was hardly a trail—until, on the 29th, they reached the pleasant open lowlands near the North Forks of Catawba. Here they were joined by more than 300 North Carolina Militia, led by Col. Cleaveland, a hunter and Indian fighter, quite the equal in prowess and experience of any who had crossed the mountains, and with a long list of private wrongs to avenge, for he had been in the thick of the civil war and partisan fighting which, since the fall of Charleston, had desolated the Southern States. On October 1 the forces, thus increased, passed Pilot Mountain and camped near the head of Cane and Silver Creeks. Thus far they had proceeded, as they had gathered together, each band under the command of its own chief; but such an arrangement involved too much disorder even for so unorganized an army as this, and the next day, dropping all local differences and personal jealousies, they agreed that Col. William Campbell should take command of the entire expedition.

Mr. NELSON obtained the floor.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do, with pleasure.

Mr. NELSON. I thought the Senator from North Carolina had yielded the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota has the floor.

Mr. NELSON. I so understood.

Mr. OVERMAN. I beg the Senator's pardon. I thought the Senator wanted to ask me a question.

Mr. NELSON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will not introduce any books to prove that Gov. Sevier was, I might say, the commanding spirit of Kings Mountain. That is so well known to the people of Tennessee that we need no books to prove it, especially none written in the interests of North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. This book was written by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], not in the interests of North Carolina, but in the interests of impartial history.

Mr. SHIELDS. We do not have to go away to Massachusetts to prove that John Sevier won the Battle of Kings Mountain. The people of Tennessee, the descendants of those who fought there, are the best witnesses. They know the history of their own country. It is common tradition in every hill and hollow of the State.

Mr. OVERMAN. Campbell was chosen to command, so history says, at the request of Gen. McDowell and not Sevier.

Mr. SHIELDS. Well, Campbell lived in western Virginia near the Tennessee line and was the friend of Sevier. But what I wish to reply to is the statement that there were Tennesseeans there. There was no Tennessee at that time. There was just one county of North Carolina west of the mountains, the county of Washington. The Senator should have remembered that Tennessee was not organized into a State until some 10 years after; but it was the people west of the mountains who won the battle, and they fought under John Sevier.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I understand the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia is a substitute for section 1. Before that amendment is voted upon I desire to offer an amendment to perfect section 1 by striking out, on page 26, line 2, the period and inserting a semicolon there and adding the following words:

Provided, however, That no preference shall be given to the ports of one State over those of another.

It is the exact language of the Constitution that I have used.

Mr. OVERMAN. I accept the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am opposed to Chapter VII as reported by the committee for two reasons: First. I believe it to be unconstitutional; second, I believe it to be unwise. It is worth while, Mr. President, to remember that the fathers of the Republic when they formulated the Constitution did not confer upon the President the power to lay an embargo. They understood perfectly that we would be at war part of the time and in peace part of the time, for they made many provisions in the charter of the Government for both peace and war.

I would like to ask the Senator from North Carolina why it was that those who framed and those who adopted the Constitution did not give the President the authority to lay an embargo upon exports in time of war?

Mr. OVERMAN. The Constitution did not provide for a commission to make rules and regulations as to railroad rates.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is that the answer? I do not perceive its relation to the question.

One of the important things in the minds of the people who made our Constitution was the right to export, was the right of the American people to do business with foreign countries. If our forefathers had believed that it was compatible with the liberty which they were endeavoring to preserve or crystallize in our Constitution that the President should have power to lay an embargo upon exports during times of war, they would have so declared.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, soon after we got away from the Revolutionary War, did not Congress grant that power?

Mr. CUMMINS. No, Mr. President.

Mr. OVERMAN. Soon after the formation of the Constitution.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from North Carolina is mistaken with regard to that; but he is quite right in saying that very shortly after the Revolutionary War Congress did pass an act which the good sense and patriotism of the people of this country very soon rejected, and which has ever since been condemned by every impartial historian. I do not know any defender of two or three of the acts that were passed during our troubles with Great Britain and France, from 1794 up to 1810. There were, I think, but two of those acts. One was passed in 1794, as I remember it, and the other was passed in 1806.

Mr. OVERMAN. And one in 1898.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; Mr. President, there was no such act passed in 1898 nor any act which, in my opinion, bears any resemblance even to the measure which is now under consideration. I would be very glad if the Senator from North Carolina would read the act to which he refers, a copy of which I know he has in his hand.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think the Senator is familiar with it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very familiar.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will read it, if the Senator wishes:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President is hereby authorized, in his discretion, and with such limitations and exceptions as shall seem to him expedient, to prohibit the export of coal or other material used in war from any seaport in the United States until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely. It will be remarked, Mr. President, that the power given to the President was first to prohibit the export of coal. I am not undertaking to inquire into the wisdom of that provision, but whether it was wise or unwise, it was very limited in its operation. Second, the President was given the right to prohibit the export of war material; that is, of material used in war. Those terms have a perfectly well-understood meaning. They are also limited in their extent as well as in their character. Such an act can not be cited in justification of a bill which proposes to give to the President the authority to close the ports of the United States entirely to every export of all kinds and of every character; that is to say, we are asked to give the President of the United States the right, the power, to say that we shall do no business at all with any country on earth.

Mr. OVERMAN. Provided he shall find as a fact that the public safety demands it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am coming to that in a moment. Such a proposal was never before made in the country. The acts of 1794 and 1806 were trivial in their character as compared with the act we are now considering, as the Senator from North Carolina will observe when he reflects upon them.

I repeat that our forefathers did not intend that the President of the United States should have the power to lay an embargo upon the business of the country in time of war. If they had intended that he should exercise a power of that kind they would have given it to him by the terms of the instrument.

That leads me for a moment to ask the attention of the Senate to the powers that were given to the President. We are living in a time when the President is exercising every power of Government, practically. I do not intend to criticize either the way he exercises the authority he has or the extent of it at this time, but I think it is helpful. I think it will be instructive if we recall the power which our forefathers, the men whose work we so highly praise upon every occasion, intended that our President should have. It is all comprised within two or three sections of the Constitution, and, lest the subject may have become dim in the mind of some Senators, I should like to read just a few words from the Constitution. Article II begins:

> The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America.

This is a general investiture of power. Whatever authority is executive in its character as understood by the statesmen of that time passed to the President of the United States. Next:

> The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States.

This is the second grant of power or description, at least, of authority. Third:

> He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States.

I have now named all the power that was given to the President of the United States in the Constitution.

I wish we might pause for a moment and compare that power with the authority which the high personage who occupies the office at the present time is exercising. I do not say exercising wrongfully, I say exercising under delegations by the Congress of the United States. It staggers me sometimes when I compare the meagerness of the power given to a Chief Executive for reasons which are perfectly well known by every student of the history of our country and of liberty and of civilization with the plenitude, the almost incomprehensible extent of power, which the Chief Executive now enjoys.

I am not even suggesting that the tendency which I deplore began with the present administration, because it did not. It has been a tendency, an unfortunate and, as I think, ultimately a fatal tendency, for many years in the United States; and I intend to do what little I can do from time to time as occasion presents itself to check that tendency. I do not believe that it is compatible with democracy. I do not believe it is consistent with free institutions. I do not believe that the tendency can continue if our country is to endure.

For these reasons I have now and then called the attention of the Senate and the country to the disaster we are inviting, to the onrushing movement carrying all the authority of Congress to the President. In the end you will all regret it. In the end a place in the Congress of the United States will cease to be a place of honor and distinction. In the end the House and the Senate will occupy a perfunctory relation to the Government of the United States. I can not view the outcome as my eyes see it with any composure whatsoever.

We are here asked, Mr. President, to transfer wholly without any restriction whatsoever the entire power of Congress in this regard.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I wish to ask the Senator if he has any idea that the disastrous tendency which he has so graphically described can be checked by anything short of a revolution on the part of the people? But I think a revolution is inevitable if free government shall be maintained. Free government never lasted very long when one man exercised all the power of government.

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes, Mr. President, I have some hope of seeing the tendency arrested, although I may have very little influence in even checking its growth; but some time the Members of Congress will become so jealous of the powers and responsibilities and honors conferred upon them in the Constitution and by the citizens who elected them that they will insist upon retaining and exercising the authority given to them by the Constitution.

Mr. VARDAMAN. God grant that that may be done. I join the Senator most heartily in his desire that it shall be done, but I do not see very much hope for it. Unless the people take the matter in hand, little change for the better may be looked for. Congress is so helpless and utterly subservient that its influence in legislation is well-nigh negligible now.

Mr. CUMMINS. With me, Mr. President, there is more hope than seems to fill the heart of the Senator from Mississippi. I know that we hold like views with regard to this subject. I feel that one of these days a light will break upon the Members of the Senate such as broke on Saul as he journeyed toward Damascus; some of these days a blaze of danger will scorch the Members of this body, and they will see the end toward which they are inevitably going.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, is not the Senator afraid it will be too late?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it will be too late, possibly, for me to see, for I am gradually reaching middle age, but there are Senators here, I believe, who will witness the regeneration, the rebirth of constitutional comprehension. There are Senators here who will be serving the Republic when it will not be asserted that in every time of emergency the Constitution disappears. I do not see why an emergency in time of peace could not be used to overturn the Constitution just as readily as could an emergency in time of war.

Mr. GORE. It will be, sooner or later, if we keep at this.

Mr. CUMMINS. Peace emergencies are as vital oftentimes to the welfare of the people as are war emergencies, and I believe that we will before long awake, not because we have pride in our own power and want to exercise it and are merely envious but because we believe that the country will be better served in the end if we do what the Constitution lays upon us to do, if we bear our responsibilities, and if we discharge our duties.

For instance, the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] is of the opinion that we ought to lay an embargo upon tin plate, either permanently or for a limited time. It may be that he is right. I have listened to his argument with the greatest interest, and it has been so persuasive that I might be willing to vote for an embargo upon tin plate to permit the accumulation of a sufficient supply in our own country; but to use tin plate, to use the exigencies of our situation in that respect as an excuse for giving the President of the United States or anybody else the authority to lay an embargo on anything which is produced by American activity, energy, and commerce is to me little less than a crime—a crime against the people as well as a base abdication of our own duty—and an unconstitutional delegation of our own power.

We confess our impotence every time we are approached for the purpose of delegating to some executive officer our power; we confess our own incompetence to deal with the subject. We are to blame for the esteem in which we are held throughout the country. We are responsible for the disparaging criticisms that constantly fill the public press with regard to our work. I do not wonder that the people of the United States look upon the Senate, and oftentimes upon the other House, as physicians look upon the appendix in the human body—to be removed just as quickly as possible because it performs no useful function in the economy of life.

I do not censure the President for gradually encroaching upon our jurisdiction. It is just as natural for men to seek power as it is to breathe. When the President and his advisers find the Congress so easily conquered and overcome as the Congresses of the last few years have been, it is not strange that day after day the arms of the executive department are reaching out for power that we alone ought to exercise.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The fact that Congress yields so readily is evidence that somebody ought to exercise the power which we refuse to exercise.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is a great deal of truth in that; and my remarks are mainly intended to awaken, if I can, the slumbering or nearly extinct spirit of the legislative branch of the Government. Because we have been slaves for a time is no reason why we should be slaves forever. Some time we shall rebel; and I am hoping, with every measure of this sort, that that time has come.

Mr. President, I do not want it understood that I am in the least degree criticizing the President. I think he is doing the very best he can. So far as his powers of Commander in Chief are concerned, I am willing to surround them and to sustain them with every resource of the Nation. I am willing to give him an army as powerful as this country can create; I am willing to give him a treasury sufficient to sustain that army. I am not criticising him, and I am not suggesting that he wants this legislation. I do not know that he does; there is no evidence before the Senate that he does. All that we know is that the Senate seems to be determined to surrender its prerogatives and its power simply because it is either too timid or too unintelligent to exercise its prerogatives and powers.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I do not think there is a Member of the Senate who does not share the views of the Senator from Iowa in the desire to uphold the hands of the Chief Executive, to give him every proper power, to render every possible assistance for carrying out the duties of the great office which he holds; but, with the Senator from Iowa, I think there are certain constitutional provisions that ought to be respected. I believe with Jefferson, "that our only security is in a written Constitution," and that the Constitution should not be changed by legislative or judicial construction, and that when we surrender to another department of the Government authority which belongs to Congress or the legislative department, we are living without the Constitution; and in that way weakening the Government.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Mississippi in what he has just said; and that brings me to consider for a moment a point of view which was stated with great power and earnestness by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES]. He said that he was willing to give this power to the President without any limitation or restriction, save that it must be within the Constitution. I wonder if those who look at it from that standpoint would be willing to give the President the power to levy any tax that he might see fit to levy, choosing the subjects upon which the tax should rest. If we have a right to give him the power of laying an embargo because of a great emegrency, because we are in the midst of war, although this is not directly connected with the war, we also have the right to give him the power to lay taxes because we are in war, and we have the right to give him the authority to expend the proceeds of the taxes without any direction whatsoever upon our part. Why not? If we can override one provision of the Constitution because we are in the midst of war, we can override every provision of the Constitution for the same reason.

I have heard a great deal said here about the suspension of the Constitution during times of war. I do not subscribe to that doctrine at all. Every provision of the Constitution is just as effectual and is just as binding in time of war as in time of peace. The only way in which we can get rid of the Constitution and the laws of the country is through a proclamation of martial law. If there be any part of our country occupied by the Army, and so occupied that the civil authorities have been compelled to suspend their functions, if the courts are closed and there is no authority recognized in that region except the authority of the Army, then I agree, when such a state exists and is properly declared, that the voice of the Commander in Chief is the supreme law in that particular locality, wherever the locality may be. If New York, for instance, were so occupied and subject only to martial law, I have no doubt that the President, by virtue of his authority as Commander in Chief, could close the port of New York, allowing no vessels either to enter the port or depart from it, and that without regard to the constitutional provision that no preference as between ports shall be given. I have no doubt that he could do what I have just suggested, even though the ports of Connecticut were open or the port of Boston were open for commerce; but, with that exception, so long as civil authority prevails and the courts are open for the adjudication of controversies, the Constitution is not only the supreme law of the land but the supreme guide for Members of Congress. In such sense, and in such sense alone, do I agree that there can be any suspension of any article of the Constitution, of any provision of this charter of our liberties and of our Government.

I have already said all that I care to say with regard to the wisdom of giving to the President or any one person this power, if we had the constitutional authority to do it, and I supplement that only by saying that there is no necessity for doing it. The Congress must be in session almost continuously during the present year at least, and if it is sought or desired to lay an embargo upon anything that we have been in the habit of exporting Congress is here to consider the measure. If it does not desire to lay the embargo specifically upon the special commodity, it can be acquainted with the situation sufficiently to establish a rule which the Secretary of the Treasury or the President or any other officer of the Government can apply to a particular state of facts.

I have no objection whatever to an embargo judged by the standards laid down in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], and I would not care whether the power was delegated to the Chief Executive or to the Secretary of the Treasury or to the Department of Justice. If it is our purpose to prevent the export of commodities which finally reach and are intended to reach an enemy, I am willing to lay down the most stringent rules in that respect to arrest by legislation any such exports, giving to the proper officer the authority to execute the law. I do not know but that I would be willing to go one step further, although I have not fully made up my mind upon that; I do not know but that I would be willing to say, if with respect to any commodity the supply in our country was absolutely needed for our own consumption, either in the way of immediate and direct consumption or indirect consumption in manufacture, that the Tariff Board, or some other body of men who were studying the problems of commerce might have authority to temporarily suspend the export of any such commodity. I do not give my adhesion to that proposal, but it is not repugnant either to my sense of the law which should govern the subject or to my views of the wisdom of interfering with the commerce of the land. Those things might be tolerated; but here we have a proposal that if the President believes it to be for the welfare—mark you, that is one of the tests and might be the only test——

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator from Iowa recall the fact that the Senator having charge of the pending bill has consented to an amendment eliminating those words, so that now it is to be determined by whether it is necessary for the safety of the country?

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not.

Mr. KING. That has been stricken out by consent.

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course, it would make no difference in the argument I am pursuing. The word "safety" is as general and indefinite as "welfare," although I think less objectionable from some points of view.

What do we understand by the word "safety"? Does it mean that it might become perilous to export these things in the war that is going on? Does it mean the moral safety, or the material safety, or the physical safety of the country? I do not know. If those words were applied to our military organization, I would know what they meant; but as applied to our general industries throughout the country, I do not know what they mean. But at any rate, whatever they may mean, and whether there is any difference between the safety of the country and the welfare of the country, I protest against assigning to any person or any board the authority which we ought to exercise, after due examination of the facts which pertain to the immediate subject.

I hope, Mr. President, that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia will prevail; for I think it is more consonant with the spirit of our institutions, as well as more agreeable to the terms of our Constitution, than is the chapter as proposed by the committee.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, in regard to this situation about which many persons seem to be very much exercised, regarding the supply of food in this country, it seems to me that a great country like the United States is not in any danger of being unable to produce the foodstuffs necessary to supply not only our own people but the world. We have an immense territory, reaching from ocean to ocean, and from the Lakes to the Gulf, vast areas of fertile lands, climatic conditions, growing seasons, and everything that would enable us to feed our own people and feed all of Europe without the slightest trouble. To me it is an astounding thing to contemplate for one moment what impresses me as a sort of hysteria, that there is any question about this country producing all the food and all the clothing that the United States and all Europe would require.

Think, for instance, of Germany, with an area only as big as the State of Texas less the area of Alabama, being able to feed 58,000,000 people, and so far as we know being able to continue that process for a good long time, and also to take care of the greatest army in the world, with many of her producers off the farm; and here we are the richest and most powerful country, with the most fertile lands, and every condition for the growing of foodstuffs, talking about a possible shortage of food!

The impression I have had for some years prior to all the present trouble has been that our problem was not so much a problem of production; that what we had to consider was not so much an increase of production in this country as a problem of distribution. We have had a great Department of Agriculture here serving the people for years and years, teaching them how to develop scientific farming; but the thing needed was some scientific system for proper distribution of the products of the farm. The problem was to eliminate the waste, the excess charges, the expenditure of vast amounts of money, the proceeds of the products of the farm, in a wasteful, useless way. The problem has been not one of scientific farming, but of scientific marketing; and in my judgment the great desideratum at this time is not so much to increase production—that can be increased almost without limit—but to devise a plan and a method or a system by which these products can get to market at the proper time, in the proper way, under proper conditions economically, and by which the waste that has been going on for years and years and the excessive charges imposed upon shipments of this kind can be eliminated. All in the world that is needed is to devise a system and a plan and a method of scientific distribution of these products.

The next question, as the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] so well said, is to devise a plan whereby these products which are perishable in their nature, which mature and must be marketed within two or three months, can be preserved and dealt out later in some wholesome and useful fashion as they are needed. For instance, we have in Florida cabbages ready for market in January; we have cucumbers, beans, strawberries, and other products of that sort in February. They must be marketed when they are ready for the market. If these products are all thrust on the market at the same time—and they have to go to market within two or three months—there is a glut, there is decay, there is wastage; they arrive in bad order, or various other causes contribute to the loss to the producers rather than to any profit on the production. There ought to be, undoubtedly, a proper plan devised whereby the excess of these products can be put into cans or some other shape, so that the surplus can be put away and taken care of and dealt out later as it is needed.

It seems to me, then, Mr. President, that this whole problem is not so much one of increasing production as it is a problem of devising a proper marketing system, organizing, mobilizing these resources, and a problem of preserving the surplus, excess products that are perishable in their nature so that they can be used for food at a later period and as needed.

In connection with my remarks, I should like to have printed in the RECORD a couple of letters that I have just received.

There being no objection, the letters referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BAGDAD, FLA., April 30, 1917.

Senator FLETCHER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Within the last three weeks the essential foodstuffs have been advanced in price until it is becoming appalling, and the poor people and laboring people are being reduced to a condition of starvation in this land of plenty. For example, a leading merchant told me to-day that sugar has been taken off the market to force prices up. Flour is now here $16 a barrel, and sellers say it will be $20 a barrel within two weeks. Corn is $2 a bushel. Breakfast bacon is 35 cents a pound.

The people are at their wits' end and are clamoring for relief. Trouble will come, trouble must come, if Congress does not give us relief. I am pastor of the Presbyterian Church here and know what I am saying. I beg and pray Congress to place a maximum price on the essentials of food supplies. That maximum should be what it was on commodities, say, three or six months ago. Something must be done.

I am an administration man and am proud of your record in Congress. My appeal is not in the way or spirit of complaint, but to save our country from being wrecked by Mr. Wilson's enemies, who are also the enemies of our country.

Faithfully, yours, Rev. C. W. HUMPHREYS.

Please rush this cause.

JACKSONVILLE, FLA., May 1, 1917.

Hon. D. U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Doubtless you have had called to your attention the serious shortage of cans for the packing of the coming season's crops of fruits and vegetables.

We have a letter from one of our connections in San Francisco to-day, in which they suggest that the shortage in tin plate continues to grow more serious every day, due largely to the exports from this country, which are continuing at the rate of 500,000 boxes a month, which would in the course of a year at the present rate make 1,500,000,000 cans. They suggest that these exports go largely to China, Africa, and other countries for use in the packing of nonedible products.

An effort is being made to persuade the Government to put an embargo on the exports of tin plate until such time as the domestic requirements for the canning of foods are covered. They suggest that a bill, being House bill 3216, has already been introduced in the House of Representatives to bring about this condition, and we beg of you, if we may be permitted to do so, to use your best efforts in assisting in the passage of this bill when it reaches the Senate.

The high cost of canned foods at the present time is due largely to the shortage of tin plate, and if we can possibly bring about an embargo such as outlined above, it seems to us that we will be doing something toward saving the consumer an unnecessary large amount of money.

With kindest regards and thanking you in advance for anything you can possibly do, we beg to remain,

Yours, truly,

A. S. BAKER CO.,
Per GEO. W. THAMES, Jr.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senate has been in session now for nearly six hours, and there are so very few Senators present that it is not likely that we will get a quorum before adjournment. I will ask the Senator in charge of the bill if he will not move a recess now?

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I have been informed by some of the Senators that they have engagements that have carried them away from here. I should like to get along with this bill as rapidly as possible. We are getting along very slowly. I hope we can get a vote to-morrow.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator can ask unanimous consent for a vote in the morning. If he asks it at this time, it will compel the calling of a quorum, and I doubt very much if we can get a quorum at this time of day.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will say that I will ask the Senate to sit to-morrow until this chapter is finished.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think we can finish it to-morrow.

Mr. OVERMAN. I hope we can, but I do not know how many arguments there will be on the Constitution to-morrow.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Speaking of the hour at which we will meet, a very important hearing will be held to-morrow morning before the Interstate Commerce Committee. I think we can start at 12 o'clock and certainly get through to-morrow.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator promise that we shall get a vote to-morrow?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I promise it so far as my own consumption of time goes.

Mr. OVERMAN. How would 11.30 do?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say that the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations meets to-morrow at 10 o'clock.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move, then——

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold that motion a moment?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator. I submit an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask to have printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

RECESS.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m., Thursday, May 3, 1917) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, May 4, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 3, 1917.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who art the inspiration of every heaven-born thought, the light of every moral and religious conception, the strength of every great and heroic act, the warmth of all the purest and sweetest affections of the human heart, lead Thou on to the perfect day when avarice, jealousy, hatred, revenge, and all that brood of vipers which follow in their wake to poison the life of the soul, shall sink to rise no more; and brotherly love, the crown of all humanity, shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea, and an international peace pact shall forever banish war from the face of the earth under the spiritual leadership of the world's great Exemplar. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE BRITISH COMMISSION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following letter:

2829 SIXTEENTH STREET,
Washington, D. C., May 2, 1917.

The Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Please allow me to express, on behalf of myself and the members of the British commission, our high appreciation of the great honor done to us by the invitation which you conveyed to me on behalf of the House of Representatives.

I and the members of the commission will be very happy to avail ourselves of the privilege offered, and I venture to suggest 12.30 on Saturday next, May 5, if that time suits the convenience of the House.

Believe me, dear sir, yours, most respectfully,
ARTHUR JAMES BALFOUR.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 2893. An act to amend section 10 of chapter 2 of the Criminal Code.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BACHARACH, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence indefinitely on account of death in the family.

SEIZURE OF GERMAN INTERNED SHIPS.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 62, authorizing the President to take over for the United States the possession and title of vessels of any subject or citizen of any nation with which the United States may be at war, and for other purposes, which is the resolution that I called up yesterday and to which objection was made.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman that there may be some debate on that resolution, and that we let it go over until after the pending debate is disposed of.

Mr. ALEXANDER. How long will the pending bill take?

Mr. WEBB. That is problematical. It will take three or four hours, I should say.

Mr. ALEXANDER. If it can be disposed of during the day, it will be satisfactory to me.

Mr. MANN. I can not answer for that.

Mr. ALEXANDER. If the gentleman is willing in the afternoon, say at 4 o'clock, if the espionage bill is not disposed of, to consent that this bill may be taken up and disposed of, it will be satisfactory.

Mr. MANN. I do not think this is a killing matter whether it is disposed of to-day or to-morrow or the next day.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It is a vital matter.

Mr. MANN. If it is a vital matter, then it ought to have been reported to the House before.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It was reported to the House just as soon as it could be given consideration.

Mr. MANN. I am not criticizing the committee, but the department ought not to expect to get legislation while you wait.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do not think the department occupies that attitude, and the pressure does not come from the department alone. The resolution was considered for a week by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate and was considered in executive session and passed Monday night.

Mr. MANN. If it was considered for a week by the Senate, it ought to have at least a chance to be considered a few minutes by the House.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I hope that when it comes up for consideration in the House it will be considered for a sufficient length of time, so that the House will understand the intent and purpose of it, so that it may intelligently decide whether it shall become a law. The situation is that we need more ships. There are over 600,000 tons of German ships in American ports.

Mr. MANN. Yes; we need more ships and more men in the Navy, and we have a bill pending for them and taking possession of all the interned ships.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Some of these ships are in a condition now for use, and others are being repaired as rapidly as possible for that purpose, and hence I do hope that gentlemen will consent that the bill may be taken up to-day for consideration.

Mr. MANN. I will not object to taking it up after the pending bill is disposed of, but for the present I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The Clerk will call the committees.

The Clerk called the committees.

ESPIONAGE.

When the Committee on the Judiciary was called,

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 291, the espionage bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 291) to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Minnesota if he desires to use any more of his time.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, all Members of the House recognize that the point of attack in this bill is not the general provisions to protect against unlawful acts against the Government. The point of attack in this bill is against the fourth section, the section that provides for the censorship of the press, and it is believed by many of us that that section is not only unwise, perhaps unconstitutional, certainly unjust, and at this time entirely unnecessary. I am not going to spend any time in discussing the general aspects of the case. I do desire, however, to call the careful attention of the Members of the House to the language contained in section 4 of the bill. It is provided that the President by proclamation may prohibit the publishing or communicating of, or the attempt to publish or communicate, any information relating to the national defense which in his judgment is of such a character that it is or may be useful to the enemy.

I desire to call the attention of the Members of the House, first, to this: That this is an anticipatory order; it is not an order upon that which has been done; it is an order prohibiting that which may be done. And necessarily from that fact it must be an order of a general nature.

I call Members' attention to the fact that when they discuss, as has been discussed here, as to whether or not certain particular information might or might not be injurious to the interests of the United States and of benefit to the enemy, that such publication can not be prevented by proclamation of the President, because the President in a mere proclamation of an individual act would be giving the information which it is desired to suppress, and one of the great dangers that lies in this particular section is that the President when he issues a proclamation must make it of a general nature. It must not be in regard to particular things, but it must be enlarged so as to include all things that may arise in regard to the general subject. For instance, if it affected the organization of the Army, if it affected the personnel of the Navy, if it affected the manufacture of ships or munitions, it must be general in its nature.

And when that fact is recognized, then we can all understand the great danger that must exist in the issuance of an order of that sort.

I desire to call further attention to another thing, and that is that the prohibition that may be issued and must be issued in advance by the President relates not to a discussion of a thing, not to the denunciation of it, not to the criticism of it, not even to an examination or discussion of it, because the language is not directed to the prohibition of such matters as that, but it is information that is prohibited. The facts are prohibited, the truth is prohibited from being made known in any form. That is the great danger. Gentlemen have discussed here as to whether or not criticism could be indulged in. There is a provision in this same section by which criticism of any of the policies of the Government or of their acts that have already taken place is protected, but that has nothing to do with an advance prohibition. It allows criticism of the act that has been done, of the fact that has been published and made known. That is a right granted to the press, to criticize the fact after it has become known. There is permission granted to the press to discuss in a general way the policies of the Government as they have been disclosed, but that is not the difficulty that we have before us. It is the right to prohibit in advance the publishing of any fact or any truth the publication of which may be regarded by the President as valuable to the enemy.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; certainly.

Mr. MORGAN. Does not the gentleman think that for the safety of the Nation in time of war the President should have that power?

Mr. TOWNER. If I did think so I would not be criticizing this section. The President now has the power to forbid in any department the issuance of any information, but that is not the difficulty.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. TOWNER. He can prohibit the issuance of information with regard to any particular fact, but this gives the President the right to say that no newspaper under any circumstances shall make any disclosure regarding any subject or any matter that may be raised that he thinks is inimical to the interest of the country.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. Does the gentleman think, then, that while the President now has the power to refuse to give out this information the newspapers of the country should have absolute liberty to publish anything which they can find out, regardless of its consequences upon the result of the war?

Mr. TOWNER. I am saying, I will say to the gentleman from Oklahoma, that already the President has all of the power that he ought to exercise. The President has the power now to prohibit information being given out by any of the departments, and if that be true, and if that is all that the gentleman thinks is contained in this bill, then the bill is unnecessary; but all of us understand that that is not all. We all of us understand that there will be general orders issued by the President regarding all of the matters that may be contained in the general policy or in all matters in any way related to the national defense.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly; I am glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question. Suppose this bill had already been enacted into law, then under it the President would have had the authority to prevent Secretary Lane from making the speech which he did yesterday, in which he narrated in detail the distressing conditions brought about by the submarine, or he could have prohibited the Washington Post and other newspapers of the city from publishing it so that the people of the country might know their real danger.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman that he is exactly right, and the danger will be that because upon some occasion some newspaper does publish something that the President does not think justified——

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. TOWNER. Not now, as I have only a few moments—he will feel impelled to make, and believe honestly that he is justified in making, an order which will prohibit any information and facts coming to the knowledge of the people. Gentlemen do not seem to understand that this is not the prohibition of wrongful criticism, of censure, or of anything of that sort, but that it is a prohibition of facts and of the truth from becoming known, and that is the point of attack. The President now has all of the power that he ought to exercise under any circumstances, and to give him more is but an invitation for him to use power that will be a greater injury by far to the Nation than the thing it is desired to prohibit.

I desire to call attention now to another fact connected with the provisions of this section. I am not sure whether or not this provision is constitutional. That may be a very close question. To say the least, it is doubtful. It is true that when there are prohibitions of certain things in statutes, the courts have gone so far as to give to the administrative departments of the Government the power to make rules and regulations regarding the enforcement of those sections, and then to say that a violation of those rules and regulations shall be considered a crime. But I very much doubt, I will say to the chairman of the committee and to those who have taken that view, that this may be carried as far as it has been in this bill. Whether a statute itself, with no provision in it denouncing an act and making it a crime by the order of the President, could be considered as within the authorities that have been quoted here is certainly questionable. I have not had time to give the question the careful examination that should be given it, but I very much doubt whether or not it could be considered that this statute was within the authorities that have been quoted.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the chairman of the committee yesterday, in reply to an inquiry, to me stated that it was inexpedient to undertake to specify either in the law or in the President's proclamation the acts which were unlawful.

Mr. TOWNER. That is very true, but I think the chairman of the committee hardly meant what he really said at that time.

Mr. WEBB. My recollection of what I said was that the President could specify or designate the character of information, but the President could not nor could Congress go into the details of the character of the information.

Mr. TOWNER. I think that would be true, and if I believed as the gentleman thinks, I would write into the provision a specific denunciation of the act of making public information that might be useful to the enemy. I would not give to the President the power to determine in advance what he thinks might be useful to the enemy. It is the duty of the lawmaking, not the executive, power to create and define crimes. Under this provision, as it stands, the jury would not have the right to pass upon the question whether the information would be useful to the enemy. Then the only thing that a man could plead, when called upon to answer an indictment under this provision, would be to the charge that he had published something which the President had prohibited. He could not have it left to a jury to determine whether it was useful to the enemy or not. That fact already would have been determined by the proclamation of the President, and the only issue that could be submitted to a jury would be simply upon the proclamation issued.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MEEKER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] controls the time.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield the gentleman one minute.

Mr. TOWNER. Two things only could be considered by the jury. First, whether or not the proclamation had been issued, and, second, whether the publication had been made of the prohibited matter. I now yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. MEEKER. Has the gentleman from Iowa been able to find any place in our past history where the newspapers, either through their representatives or the papers themselves, have betrayed any Government secrets that have affected our policy?

Mr. TOWNER. No; and I want to say now the attitude of the papers toward the Government is that of loyalty [applause] almost entirely throughout the United States.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Just before the gentleman closes his very clear statement I wish he would explain what his idea is of the word "communicate" in line 5.

Mr. TOWNER. I wish I had time to do that.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANDLER].

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I shall vote against section 4. I am opposed to it because of the exceedingly drastic provision that it contains; because I believe that it is unconstitutional in the first place, that it is un-American in the second place, which is another way of saying it is unconstitutional. One of the troubles that presents itself to me is this, that we have conferred upon the President of the United States legislative power; that is, we have conferred upon him the right to define a crime; and, in a sense, to have fixed a penalty. Now what we have delegated to the President of the United States is this, that he may have the power by proclamation to declare the existence of an emergency and by proclamation of his own prohibit the publishing or communication of or the attempting to publish or communicate any information relating to the national defense which, in his judgment, is of such character that it is or might be useful to the enemy. Now that is a crime, and to punish it a penalty is attached. Congress does not proclaim a certain thing nor does it prohibit a certain thing. It confers upon the President of the United States the power to do something, a violation of which is a crime.

I respectfully submit that the President of the United States is not the legislative branch of this Government. I respectfully submit the provision here is to delegate to him authority to create a crime with a penalty attaching, and I object to it for that reason. I object to it because it is an abridgment of the freedom of the press, and what we mean by the abridgment of the freedom of the press is not an abridgment of the rights and privileges of editors and publishers so much as an abridgment of the rights and privileges of the American people to have light thrown on certain things through the press. It is not the New York papers to be accommodated by this, nor the St. Louis papers, nor the San Francisco papers; it is the right of the American people to know everything which it is proper for them to know. Now, we know very well what has been the result in Europe of the censorship there. While the censorship is not exactly the same as proposed here, the principle is identical. I believe gentlemen in front of me now know how the British papers have lied. The British censors have compelled them to lie, and the British people do not know what has taken place with reference to the extent and the disastrous consequences of the submarine warfare. Yes; let us impose some restriction upon the press, but let us not put in the hands of a single citizen, be he the President of the United States, the power to say to 100,000,000 of people that that which they should know they can not know.

In the phrase "which, in his judgment" there is boundless discretion offered to one citizen, President though he may be. It may be contended that that danger is nullified by the proviso that follows:

That nothing in this section shall be construed to limit or restrict any discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives or the publication of the same.

The provision itself is dangerous in placing in the hands of the President the total power of deciding what the acts and policies of the Government are.

Suppose we had 100,000 men killed in the trenches in Europe in a single day. Suppose the President, in his judgment and in the exercise of his discretion under the powers conferred, should decide that it would be a depressing thing to tell the people that 100,000 men had been lost? Should the President of the United States be permitted to declare that the papers could not publish the casualties, as far as the American troops were concerned, on the battle fields of Europe? Suppose the President should conclude that it would not be the right thing for the enemy to know that the wheat crop in America was limited; that there was a shortage. Woul it be right that he should forbid the publication of the wheat shortage in America? If he did it, would it come under the acts and policies of the Government which would constitute an exception to the rule or be brought under the proviso? If so, the American people would do what the British people are now doing—they would fail to act in the matter of economy. I believe the day will come when there will be a revolt among the British people because what is really happening is being kept from them. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. RANDALL].

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, no matter what sort of mental gymnastics we may attempt to perform, section 4 of this bill is clearly an abridgement of the rights of free press and free speech, and in the time granted to me I desire to have read at the desk a protest.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the same.

The Clerk read as follows:

LOS ANGELES, CAL., April 30, 1917.

Hon. CHARLES H. RANDALL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

The Newspaper Publishers' Association of Los Angeles, representing nearly a million readers, protest to you in the name of American liberty, free speech, and the integrity of the Constitution against the proposed espionage bill, which threatens to restrict the freedom of the press. The publishers' association at a meeting to-day unanimously resolved that any censorship of the press should be confined to military and naval matters, and that any more elaborate censorship is a direct blow at the historic liberty of the American newspaper and a flat violation of the United States Constitution and the American Bill of Rights.

LOS ANGELES TIMES.
LOS ANGELES EXAMINER.
LOS ANGELES TRIBUNE.
LOS ANGELES EVENING HERALD.
LOS ANGELES EXPRESS.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman yields back one minute.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. OSBORNE].

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Speaker, about nine-tenths of this bill is devoted to purposes of national defense, as to which there is no serious disagreement. The bill has been unfortunate in the name which has been attached it as the espionage bill. In the minds of many it is thought to be a bill permitting the Government authorities to spy upon the business and movement of individuals, while the fact is that it is a bill to punish espionage on the part of foreign enemies of the United States and to meet the movement of spies and other foreign enemies. If the bill had been known as the bill to punish espionage instead of the espionage bill, its purpose would be very much better understood.

It embraces such subjects as vessels in ports of the United States, injuring vessels in American ports, interference with foreign commerce by violent means, enforcement of neutrality, seizure of arms, disturbance of foreign relations, illegal issue of passports, counterfeiting the Government seal, issue of search warrants, use of mails for circulation of matter of a treasonable nature, and other like subjects.

That these are matters that should be covered by law is hardly subject to controversy, and for my own part I am heartily in favor of the general character of the provisions in the bill on these subjects.

The one subject that is open to question is that embraced in section 4 of Title I, covering the publishing or communicating of, or the attempt to publish or communicate, information, and commonly known as the censorship section. For my own part, I have determined, and have announced my determination on this floor, to support every measure proposed by the administration to further the cause of our country in this war unless I knew the proposed action to be a mistake or so believed. I am prepared to go a long way in furtherance of legislation asked by the administration, but this proposed section goes too far. It reverses the policy of our Government as it has been conducted for 140 years and places a curb upon a free press, which I can not bring myself to believe is wise.

On this floor yesterday, in a question directed to the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee, I stated that the war had been in progress a month, and asked whether, under the self-imposed censorship which now exists among the newspapers, there had been any publication, to his knowledge, that would give aid and comfort to the enemy. Assuming that there had been no such publication during the month of war, I asked if there was not more danger of doing harm by the enactment of this section and the reversal of our ancient policy of a free press than there would probably be from a continuance of the present policy.

It may be freely conceded that there is a great deal of matter published that ought not to be published, not only in times of war but in times of peace. In times of war I believe that there should be some regulation of publications of all kinds that would prevent the enemy receiving knowledge that would be detrimental to the interests of our country. I believe, however, that this curbing and regulation should be less sweeping and drastic than that proposed in section 4. While I have been a newspaper man all my life until recent years, I have no interest whatever in the newspaper business, and I do not consider this question one in which the newspapers are the most concerned. The citizens of the United States are those who are the most deeply interested in this question. They are entitled to have all the information which can be given them with safety to the public interests. In times of peace that is information of every kind. In times of war it is information of every kind that does not impede the business and the military and naval operations of the Government. In parting with rights so essential and sacred as the right of receiving information laws should be made specific and without general provisions of unknown application. I believe that section 4 ought to be very materially modified—made specific—or it might be advisable to strike it from the bill entirely. The subject is of sufficient importance to warrant a bill devoted entirely to that subject. Further, if a modified bill should pass and it should be found inadequate, Congress is able at any time to add to its effectiveness by legislation, and it would be far better, in my opinion, to enter cautiously upon a policy of curbing the freedom of the press and of publications than to enter abruptly upon a complete reversal of the policy of free speech and free press, which has been one of the most potent and glorious privileges of American citizenship.

In conclusion, for the reasons which I have given, unless section 4 is greatly modified and made specific or is stricken from the bill entirely I shall feel constrained to vote against the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the Committee on the Judiciary has had more genuine discussion and trouble and difficulty with reference to the matters covered in section 4 than perhaps any other portion of this bill. Yet, Mr. Speaker, the great majority of the committee, I think, from the beginning realized that it was necessary to give to the President such authority, or similar authority, to what is granted in this section.

As everyone knows, we are at war and in a war, and we do not know when the end will be or what may be necessary to do in order to keep information concerning the national defense from getting to the enemy. The newspapers in this country in the main are honorable and want to do that which is best to help the Government. But the writers on the newspapers of this country are human beings, and they are prone to err, as is any other human being; and to say that these men shall have full and complete liberty to publish any and everything that they may obtain, reliable or unreliable, as ofttimes news is, would be putting the country into the greatest possible danger.

We have given to the President great authority, as it is necessary to give him great authority in time of war. He is the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy of the United States, and he must be given full and complete authority, that he may be able to get the best results out of the armed forces of our country.

Some men in this country believe it is sacrilegious to do anything against the great press of the country. They feel that they will subject themselves to possible criticism in the future or that they will not have the good will of the great press should they not give to them everything they ask. But the newspapers of this country are of the best that we have in the world. They are owned and conducted by honest and upright men in the main, and they do not expect to be given more consideration in these matters in time of war than the average citizen. And, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, we ought to be brave enough to give our support to this bill and grant to the President the authority he must have, not that he may be called upon to use it to any great extent, but there may be some papers in this country who will wish to help the enemy, and there are some now that are not giving to the President full and complete support in the war in which we are engaged.

Mr. McCORMICK. If this bill becomes a law, will it not stop the mouth of a plain citizen as well as still the pen of an editor of a great newspaper? Is it not quite applicable to all?

Mr. DYER. It should be.

Mr. McCORMICK. It should be, of course; but I understood the gentleman's remark to be directed primarily to the great newspapers.

Mr. DYER. I have heard a great deal said in defense of the great newspapers, in that they should not be forbidden to publish anything concerning the war and the national defense, and little has been said concerning the rights of the individual citizens. We are all on the same level.

Mr. DOWELL. Is there any reason why the question of the violation of this section should not be left to the courts instead of to the judgment of the President?

Mr. DYER. In time of peace I should say yes, buf in time of war I should say no.

Mr. DOWELL. Is there any statute anywhere that does not leave to the courts the question of the violation of the statutes?

Mr. DYER. I am quite sure this statute will be constitutional if enacted into law with a change. I take it that there should be some change, as suggested by several Members, but in the main the section, with a fair and reasonable amendment, will be made operative and can be used and can be put in force if need be.

I do not want to see the press of our country bridled or prevented from publishing full and complete criticisms of the President as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, of the Secretary of War, of the Secretary of the Navy, and of other officials concerning the conduct of this war. I know something about the conditions that prevailed during the Spanish-American War; and if we had not had men who were brave enough, men like Col. Roosevelt and the editors of the great press of our country, to expose the scandals connected with that war, such as the beef scandal and all, we would have suffered much loss. So I am in favor of giving full and complete liberty to the press, with the exception that we must not permit them to give information to the enemy that will work to the detriment and injury of our country—to the detriment and injury of the United States. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, the danger in this section which I as a lawyer have looked at with much interest is in the confiding to the President the power to determine what is and what is not a crime. I believe that I will be opposed to the section even though it be amended. I think, however, that it can be so amended that the danger to which I have adverted can be easily obviated.

There is no reason why the section can not be amended as follows: Strike out the President's discretion and simply prohibit the communicating of information. In that way you can obtain exactly the same results. You prohibit the giving of information to the enemy. That is what is aimed at. It is struck out by section 2, and is covered there fully, I believe; and it is on that basis that I am opposed to the section. But if this section is made a law, if it is to prevail, then in common sense and reason why should it not be so amended that the courts, the judges, and the juries should do as they have done in the past throughout civilized history—determine what is a crime, and not leave it to the individual discretion of any man.

I therefore will send to the desk an amendment and ask that it be read and that this section be amended so that it will be in accord with all other laws, all criminal laws of all times and civilized nations, so that the court and jury shall determine what shall be a crime, and not leave it to the individual discretion of any man.

I can understand that this bill has been hastily framed under the stress of circumstances, and that it has not on that account been so thoroughly digested as it might have been otherwise, and that therefore the Committee on the Judiciary is excusable in proposing it in this form. But I doubt seriously whether the lawyers in this body—and there are many good lawyers here [applause]—believe that this will stand the test of question. I do not believe it is constitutional or good, and I believe that every good lawyer in the House will agree with me. On that account I advocate primarily the striking out of the section; but if it is to prevail, then I say let it prevail in a legal and constitutional way, in the usual way. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman yields back two minutes.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the time that has been yielded back.

Mr. WEBB. How much time?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] has 2 minutes and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] 11.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, section 4 of this bill, which has been criticized, is somewhat different from any other section of the criminal statutes enacted by Congress.

In the first place, it does not leave to the courts the determination of the question of the guilt or innocence of the one charged with the violation of this law. This statute not only applies to newspapers, but to everyone. The only thing necessary to prove is that the publication or communication has been made and that, in the judgment of the President, it might be useful to the enemy. The court has absolutely no other question to determine except these two, and no one who publishes or utters anything prohibited in this section has any defense before the court, and the court does not and can not pass upon the question as to whether or not there has been a violation of this section. This is determined in advance of the trial. It seems to me that Congress should not enact a criminal statute, the violation of which is not determined by the courts of the land. If we are to take from the courts the question of determining whether a penal statute has been violated and turn it over to some other person, we are going beyond what has ever been attempted by Congress or by the legislature of any State in the Union. This is in violation of the letter and spirit of our Constitution, which guarantees to every person the right of free thought and free speech. I certainly believe that this section should be so amended, if not stricken out altogether, that at least the question of determining the guilt of those who are charged with the violation of the section shall be passed upon by the courts. I favor an amendment to this section which permits the courts to determine whether or not a certain statement or publication is in violation of law and is in fact useful to the enemy.

If some officer who has the responsibility of caring for the men who are to fight the battles of the country has been unfaithful, the mouths of those who have the facts should not be closed. The dereliction of duty of any officer or man should not be hid behind a statute prohibiting his exposure, because forsooth it might, in the opinion of some one, be useful to the enemy.

Mr. ROMJUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ROMJUE. Does the gentleman understand that this is purely a war measure?

Mr. DOWELL. I understand it is a war measure.

Mr. ROMJUE. Does the gentleman also understand that if the matter was left to the courts it might be 3 or 5 or 10 years before the question was decided?

Mr. DOWELL. The question can be determined by the courts as to whether there has been a violation. Simply because this is a war measure is no reason why some person, without a trial, without the question of his guilt or innocence being determined, shall be subject to fine or to imprisonment in the penitentiary. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. WEBB. May I inquire if it is the desire of the House to recess now?

The SPEAKER. The visiting statesmen and soldiers have not come up here yet.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, the committee think they have shown to the House that the proposition contained in section 4 is both constitutional and wise as a war measure. As I have stated, this section simply gives the President the power to designate what information, in his opinion, would, if published, be useful to the enemy, and thereby and thereupon to declare the publication of such information unlawful. I have yet to see the first newspaper denounce the principle of this section. Whether the President may be right or wrong in his opinion in a particular case, so long as he is the Commander in Chief of all the forces of this country, whenever that Commander in Chief says that certain information would be useful to the enemy if published, it seems to me that while the newspapers may doubt it, no patriotic newspaper would want to publish such information. [Applause.] Many of the newspapers of this country have been insisting upon plunging this country into war. Therefore they have been insisting upon making the President the Commander in Chief of all our forces. That thing has been done, and after we have reposed all confidence in the Commander in Chief and have placed upon him a responsibility that carries with it perhaps the destruction of our boys and our property, then some newspapers are not willing to trust the President with the determination of the question of what information may be useful to the enemy. But the fact is there are only a few newspapers, so far as I know, which are objecting to this clause. The truth is, the newspapers themselves have agreed to a voluntary censorship much more strict and much broader in its terms than the one provided in section 4, which we are now considering.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. No; I can not yield now. The truth is that before the bill was ever rewritten by the Judiciary Committee representatives of the newspapers of the country met the Attorney General and in a conference agreed that this section as drawn was unobjectionable to them. That statement was made to us by the Assistant Attorney General, Mr. Warren. In addition to that, Mr. Speaker, some newspapers have been quoted here, and I quote against them the expression of the New York World this morning, which says:

> The espionage bill as rewritten by the House Judiciary Committee wisely leaves the details of the press censorship to the President. Such objection as is now made to it rests upon the contention that in this respect it should be specific. An excellent idea as to espionage is thus distorted as to censorship. * * *
> It is not possible to write into a law precisely what this authority shall be. The danger in such a case is that the rights conferred will be too great or too small. We intrust the President in war time with almost despotic powers. He is Commander in Chief of millions of men. On his approval billions of dollars are expended. Subject always to congressional and popular criticism, he is the man who, on occasion, of which he is the best judge, should prescribe such newspaper censorship as may be necessary. Lodged anywhere else, this power is almost certain to be abused. He alone can be held responsible.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I can not yield now, for my time is too short. The argument was made a few moments ago that the President might proscribe the publication of a short wheat crop. He could not do it under the provisions of this bill, even though he wanted to, because if you turn to page 61 you will see what national defense is described as being. This section prohibits the publishing or communication of any information relating to the national defense which, in his judgment, is of such a character that it is or might be useful to the enemy.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. No; I can not; my time is too short. Now, what is the character of the information that is not permitted to be published as being useful to the enemy, in the opinion of the President? This information is set forth in section 1202 of the bill.

> The term "national defense" as used herein shall include any person, place, or thing in anywise having to do with the preparation for or the consideration or execution of any military or naval plans, expeditions, orders, supplies, or warfare for the advantage, defense, or security of the United States of America.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; I will yield for a question.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Evidently the gentleman's criticism is aimed at my remarks. In the President's address to the American people he lays stress on the fact that the agricultural products is an important consideration in conducting the war, and that it necessarily related to the national defense. Further——

Mr. WEBB. I am sorry I can not allow the gentleman to proceed further, but my time is too short. Under the definition of "national defense" we have seen that it does not——

Mr. GORDON. It refers to supplies.

Mr. WEBB. Supplies of the United States, but not the wheat fields scattered all over the country. So the gentleman's criticism does not apply. A good deal of criticism that has been made here does not apply. The bottom of the whole trouble is that many men who voted to turn over the boys to the President of the United States to send to the trenches are not willing to turn over to the President the authority to say what information, if published, would be useful to the enemy and should not be published in the papers. If you want to turn the papers loose and let them publish what they please and say that the President shall have no authority as to what shall be published in the country, where there are thousands of aliens who sympathize with the enemy [applause], cut this section out. Pray tell me why the President should not be permitted to designate the character of information useful to the enemy, say to the newspapers of the country on a question of vital national importance that that information ought not to be published because it will hurt the United States and be helpful to the enemy. The newspapers themselves ought to support this proposition instead of opposing it, as some have been doing.

But, Mr. Speaker, they suggest that the President might prohibit this thing or that thing. Well, if he does we have reserved to the papers and the public the right to criticize him for it. The press has a right to criticize, lambaste, or cartoon the President in any way it pleases if he makes a mistake in prohibiting the publication of any character of information. The truth is they have been looking at the little things and not at the mighty things that confront us in a great war. It reminds me of the fellow who always had a grouch and who was carried to the top of Mount Blanc. The party looked with rapture on the world around, hundreds of mountain peaks, and the valleys, went into raptures over the glory of the scenery, and turning around to him to hear what he had to say, he said, "I wonder what that fool hornet built a nest way up here for." [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

RECEPTION OF FRENCH COMMISSION.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as a committee to escort the French commissioners to the floor of the House the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. FLOOD; the gentleman from Maryland, Mr. LINTHICUM; the gentleman from Arkansas, Mr. GOODWIN; the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. COOPER; the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. PORTER, being members of the regular Committee on Foreign Affairs; and also appoints the gentleman from Louisiana, Gen. ESTOPINAL, and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. MCCORMICK, as they can each read and speak the French language. The committee will proceed to the Speaker's room and the House stands in recess for 30 minutes.

The Chair will further suggest that the Hon. Rene Viviani and Marshal Joffre come up in the first instance to the Speaker's desk to be presented to the House, and then that they take their stand at the right of the Speaker's desk, so that everybody can pass by and shake hands.

Accordingly, at 12 o'clock and 7 minutes p. m., the House stood in recess for 30 minutes.

At 12 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m. the commissioners of the French Republic to the Government of the United States, M. Rene Viviani, vice premier of the council of ministers; Marshal Joffre; Vice Admiral Chocheprat, of the Navy of France; and M. Emile Hovelaque, inspector general of public instruction, escorted by Mr. FLOOD, Mr. LINTHICUM, Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas, Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin, Mr. PORTER, Mr. ESTOPINAL, and Mr. MCCORMICK, entered the Hall of the House, accompanied by M. Jusserand, the French ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary accredited to the United States, aides of the French officers, and the Assistant Secretary of State, Mr. Phillips. The distinguished visitors were escorted to the Speaker's rostrum amid prolonged applause and cheers.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, I present to you the vice premier, the minister of justice of France, M. Rene Viviani. [Prolonged applause.]

M. Viviani thereupon addressed the House in French, his remarks being received with frequent manifestations of applause. The address, in English, is as follows:

M. VIVIANI. Gentlemen, once more my fellow countrymen and I are admitted to the honor of being present at a sitting in a legislative chamber. May I be permitted to express our emotion at this notable exception to rules more than a century old, and, so far as my own person is concerned, may I say that, as a member of Parliament accustomed for 20 years to the passions and storms which sweep through political assemblies, I appreciate more than anyone at this moment the supreme joy of being near this chair, which is in such a commanding position that however feeble may be the voice that speaks thence it is heard over the whole world?

Gentlemen, I shall not try to thank you, not because our gratitude fails but because now words to express it fail. No; I do not thank you for your welcome. We have all felt, my companions and myself, that the manifestations which rose toward our persons came not only from your lips. We have all felt that you were not merely fulfilling the obligation of international courtesy. Suddenly in all its charming intimacy the complexity of the American soul has been revealed to us. When one meets an American one is supposed to meet a practical man, merely a practical man, caring only for business, only interested in business; but when, at certain hours in private life, one studies the American soul one discovers at the same time how fresh and delicate it is, and when at certain moments of public life one considers the soul of the Nation, then one sees all the force of the ideals that rise from it; so that this American people, in its perfect balance, is at once practical and sentimental, a realizer and a dreamer, and is always ready to place its practical qualities at the disposal of its puissant thoughts.

And see, gentlemen, what a glorious comparison, to our profit and yours also, we can establish between our enemies and ourselves. Intrusted with a mandate from a free people, we come among free men to compare our ideas, to exchange our views, to measure the whole extent of the problems raised by this war, and all the allied nations, simply because they repose on democratic institutions, through their Governments, meet in the same lofty region, on equal terms, in full liberty.

I well know that at this very hour in the central Empire there is an absolute monarch who binds other peoples to his will by vassal links of steel. It has been said this was a sign of strength. It is only a derisive appearance of strength; and in truth, only a few weeks ago, on the eve of the day when outraged America was about to rise in its force, on the morrow of the day when the Russian revolution, faithful to its alliance, called at once its soldiers to arms and its people to independence, this absolute monarch was seen to totter on the steps of his throne as he felt the first breath of the tempest pass over his crown, and he bent toward his people in humiliation, and in order to win its sympathy borrowed from free peoples their highest institutions and promised his subjects universal suffrage.

Here, as in the crucial hours of our history as in yours, it is liberty which clears the way for our soldiers. We are all now united in our common effort for civilization, for right.

The day before yesterday in a public meeting at which I was present I heard one of your greatest orators say with deep emotion, "It has been sworn on the tomb of Washington." And then I understood the full emotion and import of those words. If Washington could rise from his tomb, if from his sacred mound he could view the world as it now is, shrunk to smaller proportions by the lessening of material and moral distances and the mingling of every kind of communication between men, he would feel his labors are not yet concluded and that, just as a man of superior and powerful mind has a debt to all other men, so a superior and powerful nation owes a debt to other nations, and after establishing its own independence must aid others to maintain their independence or to conquer it. It is the mysterious logic of history which President Wilson so marvelously understood, thanks to a mind as vigorous as it is subtle, as capable of analysis as it is of synthesis, of minute observation followed by swift action. It has been sworn on the tomb of Washington. It has been sworn on the tomb of our allied soldiers, fallen in a sacred cause. It has been sworn by the bedside of our wounded men. It has been sworn on the heads of our orphan children. It has been sworn on cradles and on tombs. It has been sworn.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, I present to you the marshal of France, Gen. Joffre. [Prolonged applause.]

In response to calls for an address, Marshal Joffre said:

I thank you. Vive l'Amerique! [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, I present you the great-grandson of Gen. Lafayette, Marquis de Chambrun. [Applause.]

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, I present to you the ambassador from France, M. Jusserand. [Applause.]

In response to calls for an address, M. Jusserand said:

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House of Representatives, I intended to repeat only the word of Marshal Joffre, though I have not the same excuse for not making a longer speech; but the words interpret very well my feelings as well as his feelings and the feelings of all my compatriots. Gentlemen, I thank you. [Applause.]

This occasion is a very great one, a unique one, and I am sure that those two men whose portraits adorn this Hall, Washington and Lafayette, those two friends who fought for liberty, would, if they could, also applaud and say to their descendants, their American descendants and their French descendants, "Dear people, we thank you." [Applause.] What you have been doing, the laws you have passed, the decisions you have taken, touch us deeply, and touch the French people in a very particular fashion, because what you have done is a sort of counterpart of what we did long ago. What we did was to come to the rescue of men who wanted to be free, and our desire was to help them and to have no other recompense than to succeed, and that liberty should be established in this new continent. [Applause.] What we did was unique in the history of the world. We expected no recompense but your friendship, and that we got. [Applause.] We did not know that ever a time would come when the same event, the same action could be taken by another of the nations of the world, and yet that time has come, the same action has been taken, with the same energy, the same generosity, the same disinterestedness that characterize the conduct of those other men many years ago. What you do now is to come to Europe to take part in the fight for liberty, a fight in which you expect no recompense, nothing to your advantage, except that very great advantage, that in the same way that we secured liberty—human liberty, individual liberty, national liberty—on this continent, you will fight to see that liberty be preserved in the Old World, and, thanks to you, we shall see the calamities of this struggle shortened, and we shall see that a new spirit of liberty will grow greater and stronger, and, thanks to you, be rejuvenated. [Applause.]

The members of the French commission then took their places at the right of the Speaker's rostrum and the Members of the House were presented to them.

The distinguished visitors were then escorted from the Hall of the House.

AFTER THE RECESS.

The recess having expired, at 12 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m. the House was called to order by the Speaker.

ESPIONAGE.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, all of the general debate, as I understand it, has now been exhausted, and under the agreement of yesterday we are to take up Titles I and XI and read them under the five-minute rule for amendment. I therefore suggest that the Clerk read Title I for amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, under the order of the House, we are to proceed to read Titles I and XI for amendment under the five-minute rule, but that does not necessarily end general debate. After we have read those titles it will be in order for the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] to move the previous question, if he so desires, but it was understood yesterday that there might be opportunity to offer some amendments to some of the other sections of the bill, and I say this so that we may have no misunderstanding about it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will have the order read so that there can be no misunderstanding about it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I doubt whether that can very well be done out of the RECORD, as it was a running conversation.

The SPEAKER. The Speaker did not happen to be in the chair at the time the order was made. What was the first thing the order provided?

Mr. MANN. The first thing in order is to read Title I for amendment under the five-minute rule, and when that is through with we are to take up Title XI for amendment under the five-minute rule .

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read Title I.

The Clerk read as follows:

TITLE I.

ESPIONAGE.

SECTION 1. Whoever, with intent or knowledge, or reason to believe that the information to be obtained is to be used to the injury of the United States, copies, takes, makes, or obtains, or attempts to copy, take, make, or obtain, any sketch, photograph, photographic negative, blue print, plan, model, instrument, appliance, document, writing, code book, or signal book, connected with the national defense, or any copy thereof, or with like intent or knowledge, or reason to believe, directly or indirectly, gets or attempts to get information concerning the national defense shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than five years, or both.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I have had very little opportunity to listen to the debate on this bill, but it seems proper to raise the question I desire to raise at the conclusion of this paragraph. What would be the effect of the enactment into law of this paragraph upon a man who is carrying about with him charts issued by the Government? Before the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] explains, if he will, I desire to say this: That a few days ago a resident of my city was arrested on suspicion of being a spy. He was traveling through the inland waterways in a small boat, thoroughly within his rights as an American citizen, having on board certain charts—and, if I am not mistaken, he got some of them from my office—charts which were issued by the Government of the United States. He has just been released upon advices by the Attorney General of the United States. It seems to me we ought to protect those of our own citizens who are carrying maps issued by the Government itself, because charts are used by thousands of men who are not only plying their business, but who are getting some pleasure out of their travels upon the waterways. They carry these maps and they must necessarily pass somewhere in the proximity of a fort or a navy yard. They ought to be protected against arrest when they have maps issued by the Government itself.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, there is nothing in this section that would make the man the gentleman from Pennsylvania speaks of guilty of any offense at all.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Well, the answer to the gentleman's statement is that the man was arrested.

Mr. WEBB. If the gentleman will look at the criminal records of the country, he will find that many of the persons indicted were proven not guilty. We can not put in this bill that nobody shall be arrested except a guilty man. Your constituent would not be guilty under this section at all, and would not be if it becomes the law.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. He was arrested on general suspicion, though a loyal friend of the Government of the United States.

Mr. WEBB. My friend realizes that we have no way to stop that, of course.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; we could do this, we could so amend this section that it would provide that it is unlawful to carry these sketches, photographs, photograph negatives, and so forth, blue prints, and so forth, maps, and so forth, except when issued by the Government of the United States——

Mr. WEBB. That would not do at all. Then every code book issued by the Government of the United States could be carried, and it would give the enemy all kinds of secrets. The man the gentleman desires to protect is protected under this section, because it requires he must make these copies for the purpose of injuring the United States.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Let me ask the gentleman this. It is not the purpose of this bill to prevent a man going over the waters of the United States carrying charts issued by the United States?

Mr. WEBB. No, I will say to my friend; of course not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That may be satisfactory to the gentleman, but my constituent has been detected and arrested.

Mr. WEBB. But not under this section, and, besides, you say he has been turned loose.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But there is something in the mortification of suspicion and arrest.

Mr. WEBB. I will say to my friend that he and I may be arrested between here and our hotels to-night, and we may not be guilty of any offense; and yet we may be arrested.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would the gentleman object to the insertion of two words here indicating that the possession of Government charts issued by the Government——

Mr. WEBB. It is not necessary.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will yield——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. MANN. That would not add to this section. This section only provides getting information with the purpose that it shall be used to the injury of the United States; having it in possession is not a misdemeanor or a crime or anything else under this section. A man obtaining a chart, however, issued by the Government for the purpose of furnishing it to the enemy may be punished under this section, but not otherwise. Having it in possession is not enough, so that adding the words would make the section worse to the gentleman's constituent than now.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not want to make it worse; it is bad enough as it is.

Mr. MANN. I think so.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It seems to me it ought to protect the man who is engaged in legitimate business who carries charts which are furnished and sold to him by the Government.

Mr. MANN. I can give the gentleman an illustration, I can give him another. Two Members of this House recently were suspected of being German spies simply because of the clothing they wore on a trip.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That would be a better case for suspicion than mine. If a Member of Congress is wandering around with suspicious clothes he ought to be detected. Some Members have even been prevented from entering the Capitol recently. There is a foolish opinion that it might be a good thing for the country if they were not permitted to come to the Capitol at all. I do not think so. We are not yet on horseback.

Mr. MANN. They can all stay away after the first of next month.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I hope so. If I can not accomplish anything by offering an amendment I will not offer it.

Mr. WEBB. I do not think it will help the bill at all from the gentleman's standpoint, because the case cited would not come within this section.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Of course, I understand it is no purpose of the bill to hold men under suspicion who are going about their lawful business, but in this case it happened.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the fears of my colleague from Pennsylvania, Mr. MOORE, are entirely groundless and certainly do not come under the provisions of this section because the arrest of the man to whom he referred took place without this section having become the law. This section as amended by the committee will guarantee protection to every innocent person because no one can be convicted under this section of any offense unless the jury finds that whatever he is charged with having done in violation of the section was done with intent or knowledge, or reason to believe that the information was to be used to the injury of the United States. Now, I will state that this is not a bad section, as the gentleman has stated, but it is a good section and will protect this country in various ways. We have written into this section that which is if a man seeks this information or obtains this information with the intent to injure the country he ought to be tried and convicted, and he can not be convicted unless the Government proves affirmatively that it was with the intent to injure the country. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. Would the gentleman yield for a question of information pure and simple?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. I notice the gentleman uses the word "whoever" in each case. Is that the best legal phraseology?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I would think so. It stands for any person who does these things. It is grammatically correct.

Mr. FESS. I am asking simply because the gentleman is acquainted with the legal phraseology, and I wondered whether that would be better than the words "any person who" or "anyone who"?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. It is just as proper and shorter.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FITZGERALD in the chair). The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 34, line 10, after the words "to the," insert "military prejudice or."

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the attention of the chairman of the committee to this particular amendment. As the section now stands, if this act is done to the "injury" of the United States, whether it be military injury, financial injury, or otherwise, there is guilt. This law is intended to be of permanent application, not to be applicable to war alone; and under its terms if a man should in time of peace, I will say for illustration, obtain a plan or a sketch, connected with the national defense, with the intent to use that to erect for himself a building like it, or use it in any way which might operate to the financial injury of the United States, he would be guilty of the offense that is made punishable by this section. It seems to me that we ought to make this law applicable to military matters only.

Mr. WEBB. I do not quite catch the idea that the gentleman suggested might be copied and converted for his personal use.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Take, for illustration, a building constructed in a fort such as these officers' quarters that are now being built at Fort Myer. There are, of course, plans and blue prints of those structures. They are of no importance, it is true, but they are connected with the national defense. Now, then, if a workman should take away one of those blue prints, or a man should obtain it from a workman, although he got it honestly, it would be to the injury of the United States.

Mr. WEBB. I think not. He would not intend it should be to the injury of the United States in any way.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. If it should be taken away and the only thing involved in it was the pecuniary loss itself; if it was only 10 cents in value and there was no attempt to work to the military injury or prejudice of this country, he would be guilty of the heinous offense denounced by this statute.

Mr. WEBB. He would not be guilty of injury to the United States. He would be guilty of larceny.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Why would you want to punish him for treason, as this statute contemplates? I say, punish the man for larceny. I will state the case again. If one of these workmen on one of these buildings should steal the blue prints of one of them in order to erect himself one like it, the injury to the United States would be perhaps 50 cents, the cost of the blue print, and that would be all, yet the man would be guilty of the offense denounced by this statute.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman seeks to convey the idea that the bill may carry the punishment for a possible petty larceny?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. GARD. If the gentleman will read the language in line 10 of Title I, as appearing on page 34, he will see that it carries with it the intent or knowledge or reason to believe that the information to be obtained is to be used to the injury of the United States. It is not that it is to the injury of the United States, but it is to be used to the injury of the United States. So that the argument which the gentleman makes of the possible taking away of a small, unimportant plan would not come within the purview of the section.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I think it would. The United States has proprietary interest in these plans and blue prints that have been made for those buildings. It is information to which the United States has an exclusive right. Let us say instead of a blue print that it was specifications for one of those buildings. A blue print is information as to how to construct a building. What I am insisting on is that we shall make this section absolutely clear. There is no reason to enact a law here that will punish a man for some offense not at all connected with the national defense.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. JUUL: Page 34, lines 18 and 19, after the word "punished," strike out all of the words after the word "punished," in line 18, and all of line 19, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "as hereinafter provided."

Mr. JUUL. Now, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, the object of the offering of this amendment is as follows: You have seven sections, one following the other. There is a different penal clause providing a different punishment in each one of them. Not one of the sections starts by defining what the crime is. You do not in this bill get down to that point until you strike section 202, on page 39. For the first time in the bill you state that it shall be unlawful to do so and so. Until section 202 you have not stated that any of the things shall be declared unlawful.

You start right away to furnish penal clauses, and not two of them are alike. My amendment has this object in view: The first one strikes out the penal clause, and so will the second, and the third, and fourth, and the fifth, and the sixth amendment that I propose to offer, and the final amendment will cure what I think is a vital defect of this bill. The amendment is as follows:

Whoever shall willfully violate any of the provisions of the foregoing section shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 15 years, or both.

That amendment will do away with seven different penal clauses. I think there is too much "imprisonment" in too many places in the bill, and no two of them are alike, and the second clause contains the death penalty; and, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I think it should not be contained there. I think it was on account of a drastic law of that kind that the Cavell incident in Belgium happened. We are apt to be a little excited and hysterical, and we will have an execution on our hands which five or six months after the war is over in which we shall be very unhappy to have participated. I move, therefore, that the penal clause be stricken out of this section and the following six sections. I make that motion as an amendment. If there is no objection, I will offer them now. Is there any objection to offering them now?

Mr. WEBB. I will say to the gentleman that I have no objection.

Mr. JUUL. They are all on the same subject, striking out the clauses providing the punishment in seven sections and furnishing one penal clause for the first seven sections. I will ask to have them read.

Mr. STAFFORD. They are not in order at the present time. The sections have to be read separately. The amendments at the present time are not in order under the rules of the House. The sections have first to be read, and then the amendments can be offered serially.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUUL].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Speaker, I do so for the purpose of asking for information as much as anything else from the chairman of the committee, as to whether anywhere in this bill there is a provision which would punish one who aided, assisted, or abetted another?

In my judgment, this first section clearly and exclusively punishes the party who attempts to copy, take, make, or obtain any sketch, and so forth. In line 16 there is a phrase which says that anyone who "directly or indirectly gets or attempts to get information concerning the national defense shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished," and so forth.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly.

Mr. WEBB. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. DEWALT. I have yielded to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I would refer the gentleman to section 6 of the bill.

Mr. DEWALT. I read:

If two or more persons conspire to violate sections 2, 4, or 5——

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly.

Mr. WEBB. Section 6 does not cover the point raised. That makes all aiders and abettors of crime punishable the same as the principal.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. If one aids another to do an unlawful act, he is punished under section 6.

Mr. DEWALT. I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania and also with the gentleman from North Carolina in their assertion of the law as a legal proposition that one who aids or assists or abets another in the commission of a crime would be punishable provided the crime was not a felony, and is as guilty as the principal, and is called a principal in the law. That is a basic proposition and a legal proposition, but this section itself clearly and definitely says that the party who obtains the information shall be punishable. Now, I will be satisfied with the opinion of the learned gentlemen who are on the Committee on the Judiciary if they think this is strong enough to cover the party that aids, assists, and abets the principal. I will be satisfied with it then, but in my humble judgment as a lawyer the phrase and the clause would be stronger if they included immediately after the eleventh line the words that "anyone who aids, assists, abets, or procures another to obtain such information is equally guilty."

Mr. WEBB. I will say to my friend that if we would write that into this law we would be simply writing what is the law to-day. It is a part of the criminal statutes that the aider or abettor is as guilty of the same crime as the one whom he aids or abets.

Mr. DEWALT. I am merely suggesting it to you as a tentative idea.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. Whoever, with intent or knowledge, or reason to believe that it is to be used to the injury of the United States communicates, delivers, transmits, or attempts to communicate, deliver, or transmit to any foreign Government, or to any faction, or party or military or naval force within a foreign country, whether or not recognized by the United States, or to any representative, officer, agent, employee, subject, or citizen thereof, any information, document, writing, code book, signal book, sketch, photograph, photographic negative, blue print, plan, model, note, instrument, or appliance, relating to the national defense, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 20 years, or both: Provided, That whoever violates this section in time of war shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than 30 years, or by death.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I desire to move two merely formal amendments to this section. I move to insert in line 5, on page 35, after the word "shall," the words "upon conviction thereof"; and in line 8, after the word "shall," the words "upon conviction thereof," so that the section would then read, "shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished" in each case.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, the committee has no objection to that, but we think it means that anyway.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 5, page 35, after the word "shall," insert the words "upon conviction thereof"; and in line 8, on page 35, after the word "shall," insert the words "upon conviction thereof."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the chairman a question or two. I regret I was able to be in the Chamber only part of yesterday to hear the general debate. However, I heard all of the debate on the preceding day, and took some little part in the local debate. I received this morning this letter from western Washington:

The Industrial Worker, official organ of the Industrial Workers of the World, published at Seattle by J. A. McDonald, 2118 Seventh Avenue, on April 7 published a scurrilous editorial pertaining to the recruiting bureaus of the United States Government. This was a vulgar, as well as slanderous article, and not fit to be reprinted.

Now, I ask the chairman this: Will this bill in any place suppress publications of that kind?

Mr. WEBB. Not unless they are anarchistic or treasonable in their character.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And yet we propose to have in section 4 a supervision over publications which will simply harrass well-meaning and upright newspapers.

Mr. WEBB. I will say to the gentleman that the present statute already provides against the publication and circulation of obscene literature.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Ah, but this complaint is not against obscenity.

Mr. WEBB. But the law reaches the other charges.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I think not. Let me read a little more from the letter.

The United States district attorney for western Washington has stated that there is no law providing for the punishment of such insulting and slanderous articles.

The law-abiding citizens of this community feel that there should be some statutory provision that will provide for the punishment of anyone attempting to slander our Government.

Mr. NORTON. The gentleman says this is a libel. There are laws to cover that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; a slander on the Government; but we have taken cases similar to this into the Federal court without success.

Mr. NORTON. Does not the gentleman think if that article was published in the Menace it would probably be all right?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No; it would not be all right. Please understand that my correspondent does not say it was a vulgar article, but that it was a slanderous article. The gentleman, and all other gentlemen, know as well as I do just what kind of an article it was, and none of us have seen this particular one. It is probably just like the one read here a couple of days ago, but omitted from the RECORD by general consent on account of its near-treasonable and positively dangerous statements.

Mr. Chairman, the reason I ask about this is because we have had in my part of the country seven years' war with this organization known as the Industrial Workers of the World. I am informed here in another letter that while we are asked by the Government to build in my district 75 wooden ships in addition to the 100 and more we are now building in the Pacific Northwest, the plans are all laid for the bringing on of an Industrial Workers of the World strike in May in shipyards and lumber yards. In one county out there I am told that there are 2,000 card members of the Industrial Workers of the World, which now represents, as nearly as I can understand, the red element or the vicious element, in fact the outlaws, of the Socialist Party. They want trouble. They will make trouble first on one side of the country then on the other side, and never for the good of the workingmen, but for the general disturbance of the country, and for the aggrandizement and livelihood of their outlaw leaders, who go to the point of treasn in every utterance and every speech—war times or peace times.

One man who writes to me goes on to say that in a town of 15,000 people when a couple of companies of State troops and naval militia marched down the street at Uncle Sam's call, these Industrial Workers of the World stood on the sidewalk and hissed the troops that we are sending out.

I have to-day received a telegram in regard to Industrial Workers of the World activities, signed by all the lumber manufacturers of the one great shipping district, who can see the strike coming, and who ask that something be done in view of the Government's proposal that a large number of ships be built of wood on the North Pacific coast immediately.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman does not want to turn a statute designed to punish treason into an antistrike statute, does he?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No; but I would like those who propose to work, and work hard, for the Government to be protected against these nonloyal agitators who not only preach but practice sabotage, destruction of property, and disorder generally. I am sorry that we propose here to pass a bill to check the newspapers that will do their best. It is to the credit of the newspapers that their representatives did not attend the hearings before the committee or ask to be heard. How could they in fairness? Besides, the well-meaning newspapers know the provisions of the Constitution with regard to a free press just as well as do the editors of these wretched Industrial Workers of the World sheets. I am the publisher of a newspaper. I know that every publisher and every editor of a legitimate paper wants to do everything that is right, and, Mr. Chairman, it would seem that while these editors of the legitimate newspapers are going to be checked and brought into all kinds of trouble by this thing, these scurrilous Industrial Workers of the World papers will go scot free and continue to libel, slander, and strike at this Government.

Mr. LONDON. And particularly the lumber manufacturers.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The I. W. W. seems to insist on making trouble for the lumber manufacturers. They practice sabotage on them. They go into the camps where they are getting out logs and drive great spikes into the heavy logs, for the purpose of having the saw hit the spikes when the log goes into the mill, resulting in much damage generally.

Mr. WEBB. That is a local matter, and your State laws ought to take care of that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Sabotage does not allow itself to get caught.

Mr. WEBB. We can not catch it, then, if you can not.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The Legislature of Washington passed a law this winter dealing with sabotage. The governor vetoed it. And the seven-year war goes on. At Everett, in my State, almost 70 I. W. W.'s are being tried—one by one—for murder and conspiracy. The trial of the first case has been going four or five weeks, or longer. Those murder trials will go on all summer, probably. Remember, there have been as high as 12,000 Socialist voters out in my district. Socialists, generally, however, repudiate the I. W. W.'s and are called by the latter "yellows." What the reds want is action, direct action, and they preach it all the time. What we want and ask from Congress is a law making more clear the crime of treason, defining treason in terms that will reach those who are guilty of this new kind of treason. Better not curb the press, even if we have to let the vicious I. W. W. press, if not obscene, live along with all other newspapers, unless we can charge them with actual treason.

We go to some great lengths with our present laws. Only a couple of days ago the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] asked me if under the State laws of Washington we had not recently sent a Socialist to jail for slandering George Washington. Yes; we did; not exactly for slander but under the State law with reference to the libel of the dead. That is a fine stretch of the law, is it not? How this law will be stretched, if it is enacted, no man can even dream. It will do more harm than good.

This section 4, in my opinion, marches up the hill and, by the preamble, marches down again. In reality it does nothing but give a lot of power to agents of the President—a lot of power that can only make trouble.

Now, Mr. Speaker, one more phase of this situation: Curb the press and you will open the way for a lot more letters like the one I shall now read:

APRIL 26, 1917.

Hon. ALBERT JOHNSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Our State grain inspector reports 12,000,000 bushels of wheat in the elevators in our State and 600,000 bushels in the farmers' hands out here. Since war was declared by the United States flour has jumped in price to $3.50 per 50-pound sack and wheat to $2.50 per bushel. What are you going to do about it? How can you expect the people to volunteer to fight for a Government that will allow such conditions to exist?

Yours, respectfully,

——— ———.

I will not use the gentleman's name. He is not a Socialist. He asks a fair question. Let us think about his inquiry, and let us remember there will be other inquiries along other lines and concerning the living problems. I have no malice in the matter. I said the other day that I thought Congress was beating about the bush in an effort to provide a sort of censorship that is already established by regulation. Instead Congress should be going to the meat of the thing by preparing laws defining treason, so that the authorities can get after those newspapers which are actually preaching treason and endeavoring might and main to tear down this Government. I thank gentlemen for their attention. [Applause.]

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I do that for the purpose of calling the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that this section also confines itself to denouncing acts done with the intent of "injury" without confining it to military injury. This is a much more serious situation than the one presented by the first section, because here we are creating an offense that is punishable by death. What I said with reference to the other section is applicable with increased force to this section. I am satisfied that the committee does not wish to have a law passed here that would make a man guilty of an offense punishable by death for a mere petty larceny or for some other delinquency not of a serious military nature. I am wondering why it is that the committee are not willing to make it absolutely clear that it is an exclusively military offense that is being provided for—that is, an act to the military injury of the United States. I am wondering why the committee will not make that absolutely clear by inserting the word "military" before "injury."

Mr. WEBB. I will say to my friend that it is as nearly confined to that as it is humanly possible to make it. It says:

Code book, signal book, sketch, photograph, photographic negative, blue print, plan, model, note, instrument, or appliance relating to the national defense.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Or any document or writing whatsoever.

Mr. WEBB. Any man who transmits those important possessions of the United States to a foreign government for the purpose of injuring his own Government ought to be punished.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The language of the section does not specify that the documents, and so forth, shall be furnished to a foreign government. It is not confined to that. A man might turn over one of these documents to some one without knowing that it was to the agent of a foreign government. The section does not require that he shall have knowledge that the document is to be used by some foreign government or to the prejudice of the United States.

Mr. WEBB. Here is what it says. The language is plain:

Transmits, or attempts to communicate, deliver, or transmit, to any foreign government, or to any faction, or party, or military or naval force within a foreign country, * * * or to any representative, officer, agent, employee, subject, or citizen thereof.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. And not even with knowledge that he is a citizen or agent. The offense is not postulated upon such knowledge. The offense is postulated merely upon the intent to work an injury to the United States. So that if a man, with intent to work an injury to the United States—that is to say, to give to somebody else plans and specifications which are the exclusive property of the United States and which work to it merely a financial injury—should turn these documents over to some person whom he does not know, and having no thought that he is an agent of a foreign Government, and it should actually transpire that the man he turns them over to is the agent of some foreign country, then the man is punishable by death.

Mr. WEBB. The court could punish him by sending him to jail for 10 days or 1 day or for years.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The gentleman says that is what the court would do, but we are talking about the law. The court can, under this law, take the man's life.

Mr. WEBB. Yes; if, in time of war, he commits the offense against the spirit of the statute, he ought to have his life taken.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. He may have done it merely with the intent of doing a financial injury to the Government, not exceeding 50 cents in extent.

Mr. WEBB. Then the court would take that fact in consideration and punish him accordingly.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. DEMPSEY: Page 35, line 9, after the word "years," strike out the words "or by death"; line 8, after the word "punish," insert the words "by death or by."

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this amendment is simply to make, as all statutes do, the maximum penalty the first penalty. That is the universal practice in statutes of this kind—in all criminal statutes. Here you make your minimum penalty precede your maximum. It is simply a formal amendment to make it conform to the invariable practice.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will not insist upon that amendment. It is merely a matter of words.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. Does not the gentleman think that the statute, providing for a very severe punishment—30 years' imprisonment—is quite severe enough without having the death penalty also?

Mr. WEBB. Oh, no; I think that in time of war some offenses should be punishable by death. Spying on the Government in time of war in every country in the world is punishable by death. We are very liberal, because the punishment will depend upon the judge. He may say whether or not it shall be 1 day, or 30 years, or, if the crime be extremely malicious and treasonable, death.

Mr. JUUL. I want to ask the gentleman, if he will permit me, whether this is not the very wording in the German statute that every newspaper in the United States objected to when Miss Cavell was put to death?

Mr. WEBB. I do not know.

Mr. JUUL. Is it not a fact that if there had not been a death penalty provided for her conduct she would be alive to-day?

Mr. WEBB. I do not know that. My friend would not argue that a man who betrays his country in time of war by giving away profound secrets concerning the national defense should not be punished by death?

Mr. JUUL. He should be punished; but 30 years is a long time.

Mr. WEBB. I think the Cavell case came under court-martial.

Mr. JUUL. I suppose it did; but there was warrant for punishing her in that manner.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair suggests to the gentleman from New York that the word "by" should be eliminated, as it is already in the bill, and, without objection, the amendment will be so modified.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. Whoever, having possession of, access to, control over, or being intrusted with any information, document, writing, code book, signal book, sketch, photograph, photographic negative, blue print, plan, model, instrument, appliance, or note, belonging to, intended for, or under the control of the United States, relating to the national defense, willfully and without proper authority communicates or transmits or attempts to communicate or transmit the same to any person, or willfully retains the same and fails to deliver it on demand to the person lawfully entitled to receive it, or through gross negligence permits the same to be removed from its proper place of custody, or delivered to anyone not lawfully entitled to receive it, or to be lost, stolen, abstracted, or destroyed, shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than five years, or both.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania: Page 35, line 10, after the word "to," insert the word "or." Strike out "or being intrusted with any information," in line 11, and insert in lieu thereof the word

"any." On line 15, after the word "defense," insert the words "or being intrusted by any such person with any information relating to the national defense."

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, may I ask my friend if that is the amendment that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Dr. TEMPLE, suggested?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. This is the amendment that Dr. TEMPLE suggested to me yesterday.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the committee has any objection to it.

Mr. GARD. Is the gentleman sure that he has arrived at the object he desired?

Mr. MANN. Some one should explain the effect of it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I will speak to the amendment. The language in the section as it stands reads as follows:

Whoever, having possession of, access to, control over, or being intrusted with any information, document, writing, code book, signal book, etc., willfully and without proper authority communicates or transmits—

And so forth.

The ambiguity in that language relates to the first two lines—

Whoever, having possession of, access to, or control over, or being intrusted with any information.

It is capable of a double interpretation, and I think both are there included. A man might be in possession of information. As was suggested by my colleague, he might receive a letter from his son in the naval service, and he would be in possession of information and he might communicate or mention that to some one else, and therefore be liable to the penalty provided in this section, whereas the section was never intended to meet or touch any such innocent performance as that. When we take "or being intrusted with any information" and place those words in the fifteenth line, which my amendment suggests, we remove the ambiguity and the section would then read:

Whoever, having possession of, access to, or control over any document, writing, code book, signal book, etc., under the control of the United States relating to the national defense, or being intrusted by any such person with any information relating to the national defense, willfully and without proper authority communicates—

And so forth.

The purpose of the language was to make the man punishable who was intrusted with information and who imparted it. Objection was made yesterday by my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] that the language "or being intrusted by any such person" might put a limitation upon it. My amendment intends that that limitation shall be put upon it because this section is a punishment for breach of trust, and the illustration which the gentleman gave of a military officer not having possession of any of these documents giving that information to somebody else would not be a violation of this statute. This amendment would not bring them, I admit, under the provisions of this statute, nor would I intend that the amendment should bring them under the statute because this is a breach of trust section, and on that ground alone it should be interpreted. Now, if a military officer gives information to somebody else, we turn to the prior section to find the basis for punishing him if it has been done with a guilty intent and knowledge. That is the whole answer.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Take the case of a general intrusting an orderly with certain information, and he communicates it to some other officer of the Army. With the language as it stands if the communication was made to a third person he would be guilty of a violation of the act. With the gentleman's amendment he would not; no matter how serious the breach of trust might be, no punishment would be provided by the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. The man would be punished under the prior section if there was a guilty intent.

Mr. TEMPLE. In the case supposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin there would not be any jurisdiction in the civil courts at all; he would be tried by court martial.

Mr. LENROOT. That is true; but suppose the Secretary of the Navy should call in the owner of a ship with reference to trusting him with certain information as to the intention of this Government in sending troops abroad. With the language as it stands if that person made a breach of trust he would be within the terms of the section and could be punished. But with the gentleman's amendment, however important the trust might be, if he conveyed the information, he could not be punished.

Mr. MANN. Why not?

Mr. LENROOT. Because it only relates to such person who has possession of, had access to, or control over, documents, writing, code book, signal book, and so forth.

Mr. MANN. I was going to ask what the words "such person" referred to.

Mr. LENROOT. To "whoever."

Mr. MANN. "Whoever" is the beginning, the one who is intrusted with the information. You can not have both the nominative and the accusative.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. It is the same that is carried by amendments through the entire section. This is a breach of trust, and the cases that are cited by my friend are punishable by a court-martial or under the prior section of the act if done with an evil intent. If they are not done with an evil intent, they ought not to be punished at all.

Mr. LENROOT. Suppose he gives it to a newspaper reporter.

Mr. MANN. "Whoever" refers to the person to be punished. The person giving out the information is the one to be punished, and that is what "whoever" refers to. "Such person" can not be that. "Such person" may be an officer in the Army who gives the information to a private citizen. The person to be punished is "whoever." He is the one who furnishes the information after being intrusted with it by some one else. "Such person" does not refer to anybody.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Is that the gentleman's objection?

Mr. LENROOT. That is my objection.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I will ask unanimous consent to strike out the words "by any such person."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks to modify his amendment as reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "by any such person," so the amendment will read:

"Page 35, line 10, after the word 'to,' insert the word 'or.' Strike out 'or being intrusted with any information' in line 11 and insert in lieu thereof the word 'any.' On line 15, after the word 'defense,' insert the words 'or being intrusted with any information relating to the national defense.'"

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the modification of the amendment?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I trust that the chairman of the committee will not agree to accept this amendment. If the chairman will recall, this matter was thoroughly discussed in the committee in connection with a suggestion very similar to this. The only effect of inserting that in there, in my opinion, would be to get this section all balled up. The intention is that whoever has possession of this information, or whoever is intrusted with it, shall be punished. Now, you put the intrusting clause as applied only to the information and not to the other matters set out in the section, and we will not be able to punish anybody who has possession of this information, whether he gets it rightfully or wrongfully. The language reads "whoever is intrusted with information, code book," and so forth. To transfer it after the word "defense" does not change the effect of the section or what we are seeking to punish, except to weaken the section.

Mr. IGOE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. IGOE. I want to point out that this section is intended to punish only the information belonging to and intended for or under the control of the United States. Now, then, it seems to me that the gentleman, by inserting after the word "defense" "and be intrusted with any information," runs into the difficulty he is seeking to avoid, because that means any information, whether it belongs to the United States or whether it is communicated to any individual. It seems to me the gentleman, by widening the scope of it, includes people not entitled to the information.

Mr. GARD. In addition to the pertinent observations of the gentleman from Missouri, does not the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania cut out from the operation of law or eliminate the information, document, writing, code book, signal book, and so forth? Surely that is not the idea of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. NORTON. Do I understand the gentleman to infer that if this information is intrusted to him he will not have possession, access to it, or control over it?

Mr. WALSH. Well, the person might be intrusted with the information and not have it in his possession.

Mr. NORTON. Would he not have access to it or control over it?

Mr. WALSH. It might so happen. The latter part of the section is "through gross negligence."

Mr. NORTON. Has the gentleman any case in mind of that kind where information is intrusted to a man where he would not have possession of it?

Mr. WALSH. Oh, yes; he might have information in the way of orders or a code intrusted to him, and he might go off and leave it on his desk. It would not then be in his possession, but he would be intrusted with it, yet somebody could get possession of it, and he would have possession of it, and it would not be intrusted to him.

Mr. NORTON. I do not see how that applies here at all.

Mr. WALSH. Well, it would apply. We had other instances cited to the committee, and so, I repeat my suggestion, that I trust the chairman will not agree to accept the amendment. I think the meaning of this section as drawn is perfectly clear.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. MANN. In the case the gentleman just cited of an officer having possession of a code book and going off and leaving it on his table and somebody getting it, he would be punished regardless of whether this amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania goes in or goes out.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; he could be punished; I only cited that in answer to the gentleman's inquiry as to whether a man could be intrusted with something and not have it in his possession. He would be punished just the same under the provisions of this law, as I pointed out.

Mr. MANN. Well, the other provisions of the section punish anybody who has possession of any of these documents, or who has access to them or control over them, who furnishes information relating to them, or furnishes them.

Mr. WALSH. Or who is intrusted with them.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania as the proponent of this measure whether a transposition of the words "being intrusted therewith" from line 11 to line 15 would not cut out the idea of being intrusted with documents, writings, code books, and so forth, because the prior sentence is "having possession of"? I would like to have the gentleman's construction as to whether a transposition of the words "being intrusted with" from line 11 to line 15 would not cut out the idea of punishing a party who was merely intrusted with a book, documents, and so forth.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman who offers the amendment that the objection raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE] can be readily obviated by not striking out the words "or being intrusted," in line 11, so that the section would read at the commencement:

> Whoever, having possession of, access to, control over, or being intrusted with any document, writing, code book—

And so forth.

That saves the question of objection to this part of the section that a person intrusted with documents would be eliminated, which seems the only objection made to the amendment.

Mr. TEMPLE. Whoever having possession of it and makes improper use may be punished. Does not that cover the case, he having possession of it through being intrusted with it?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Well, that is something——

Mr. TEMPLE. He is intrusted with it; it is a part of the thing covered by the broader language.

Mr. DEMPSEY. He might not have the physical possession and yet he might be intrusted with it. It might be the case of a code, where he might be directed to go and get it and never actually got it, and yet he might have been intrusted with the secret of where it was and give that information to some one else who might go and get it, without it ever having been in his possession.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Would not that be intrusted with information instead of being intrusted with documents?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Well, it might be. I can not see this modification would in any way harm, and it does seem to me it would meet objections which have been made to the amendment. I am not fighting the amendment. I am for it, and I am simply trying to perfect it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment by Mr. HUDDLESTON: Page 35, line 19, after the words "receive it," strike out lines 19, 20, 21, and all of line 22 before the word "shall."

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, this section is a very extreme section. In my opinion it is the most extreme section in the whole bill. Under this section petty larceny of something of trifling value may be punished by $10,000 fine and five years imprisonment. But the most extreme part of this section is the part that I am offering to strike out, which is the language, beginning in line 19, "or through gross negligence permits the same to be removed from its proper place of custody, or delivered to anyone not lawfully entitled to receive it, or to be lost, stolen, abstracted, or destroyed."

I venture to say that this is the first time in the history of our country when Congress has been asked to enact a law which would punish gross negligence with five years in the penitentiary and $10,000 fine, when the only result of the negligence is the loss of property which might be of trifling or perhaps scarcely of any material value.

To punish a man for gross negligence where his act results in the loss of human life is an extreme thing itself, and it is very difficult to secure a conviction. But under this statute if one of the workmen out at Fort Myer, where they are putting up officers' quarters, should, by gross negligence—that is, by failing to exercise slight care—lose a blue print or a copy of plans and specifications or any other document or writing, without it coming into the hands of the enemy and without any real harm being done to the Government, except the mere loss of a small piece of paper, that man would be guilty of this offense. In making a criminal law it is no answer to the argument that the law is unjust and improper to say that the courts will not enforce it, or that we may depend on a certain amount of judgment and common sense being used in enforcing it. That is begging the question. The question is, will we enact a sane and reasonable law?

I am not willing to put a man's liberty at somebody's mercy; to leave it to the discretion of a prosecuting officer, judge, or jury whether he shall or shall not be punished. I do not see how I could possibly be brought to support a measure that would put upon a man such an extreme penalty for an offense of perhaps no significance whatever. I want to vote for this bill; but I can not vote for an unreasonable bill which fixes extreme punishment for trifling offenses.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I will.

Mr. MANN. Suppose the Government is building some barracks, which I apprehend we will be doing, and the architect has a blue print in the hands of a workman—I do not know whether they would be considered blue prints in connection with the national defense in connection with the Army—and the workman carelessly leaves it where he has been working, is he subject to the penalty?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Undoubtedly so, I will say to the gentleman, and that is exactly what I am trying to correct, just exactly that thing.

Mr. MANN. You will have to raise the wages of the workman if you do that.

Mr. BATHRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I will.

Mr. BATHRICK. Take another supposition. Suppose here is an important document that reveals the movement of troops intrusted to some person, the securing of which by an enemy might defeat our Army, and the person in whose hands this document was placed might leave it carelessly in some place, might not feel the responsibility placed upon him; what would happen then?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Would the gentleman want to put a man five years in the penitentiary if he absent-mindedly walked out leaving a document on a table, without criminal intent and without any thought of having the document placed in the hands of an enemy?

Mr. BATHRICK. I will answer the gentleman's question——

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I will say to the gentleman the offense he mentions is covered by the next section of this bill. It is not necessary to state an extreme case. Let us imagine extreme cases for the benefit of human liberty. Let us conceive an extreme case for the protection of human rights. Let us not take the most extreme case possible where injury could be done as an excuse for passing a foolish law.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, just one moment. The gentleman from Ohio has suggested the reason for putting this provision in the bill. There has been complaint that officers of the United States Navy and Army have carelessly, even grossly and negligently, permitted the code books and signal books to be taken away. Not long ago a Japanese officer got control of one of the United States signal books, and we had to rewrite our entire signal code of the United States. Now, we intended to make an officer who is intrusted with that very vital and imported information concerning the Government not only careful but extremely careful in the preservation of it. He should never leave it unless it is locked up and put away where the authorities say it should be kept, in order that the enemies or spies or agents of foreign governments may not get hold of it. My friend must know that we do not intend to, and no district attorney would ever, prosecute a workman out here building a house because he had laid aside a blue print which has nothing to do with the national defense.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Would the gentleman be willing to leave the workman's liberty at the discretion or whim of a district attorney?

Mr. WEBB. Everybody is at the whim of some one, more or less.

Mr. DOWELL. Under this law why would he not be prosecuted; and if he is, what defense can he make?

Mr. WEBB. The chief defense he would make would be that he was not grossly negligent.

Mr. DOWELL. But this does not provide any such thing.

Mr. WEBB. It does provide if he is grossly negligent.

Mr. DOWELL. If he is grossly negligent he has no defense, and it makes no difference whether it comes within the provisions suggested by the gentleman or whether it was intentional.

Mr. WEBB. I would say to my friend that my interpretation of the provision is that it would not cover the building of a house somewhere in a fort. It would be the fort itself, the things that are vitally connected with the national defense, a book or a photograph which would give the enemy the tunnels, the location of the guns, and things like that, and not the building of a house by a poor mechanic somewhere.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman permit? The Germans pursued the retreating Russians on the east front with remarkable speed, notwithstanding the Russians had destroyed the bridges behind them; but it was afterwards found that the Germans had duplicate blue prints of those bridges, and had prepared themselves by making duplicate parts of them so that they could replace the parts destroyed. Somebody mislaid or actually gave away blue prints of them.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, this is the only section in the bill which is directed in a civil way to the officers of the United States Army and Navy. While we are restricting the rights of the civilian, we ought to make it imperative on the officers of this Government to preserve with a scrupulous care every one of these profound and important national secrets involving our military and national existence. [Applause.]

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. This statute does not apply to officers. It applies to every man who may be intrusted with information, and it does not make any difference whether the information is important or not.

Mr. WEBB. Oh, you will not find the $2.50 mechanic in the United States intrusted with information such as is described here.

Mr. MADDEN. Do you pay only $2.50 to mechanics down in North Carolina? They pay $7 or $8 per day out my way.

Mr. WEBB. Yes; and they pay $7 or $8 down in my country, too, depending on their skill.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. If through gross negligence and careless conduct, a man should lose documents or papers, could he be punished under military laws?

Mr. WEBB. I have not read the law on that subject, but I think they tried to court-martial this particular officer that has been mentioned.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Well, if they court-martialed him, and if the court-martial dismissed him, what recourse would he have?

Mr. WEBB. He would have no recourse except to be tried under this civil section in the United States courts.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. WEBB. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it not absolutely established that Gen. Lee lost the Battle of Antietam because one of his generals, Gen. Hill, I believe, lost his plan of battle, and it fell into the hands of Gen. McClellan?

Mr. WEBB. I have heard it so stated.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Was that general who lost that paper ever punished, although Gen. Lee had the autocratic power of commander in chief?

Mr. WEBB. No; and I suppose it was because it was perhaps a pure accident.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. My stars! What is negligence if it loses an order like that, that fixes the plan of a campaign or a battle—a valuable document?

Mr. WEBB. I do not think that that kind of a document would be covered by this section. Court-martial would be his fate in time of war.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If that kind of a document would not be covered by it, what would be covered? I take it that no document was ever lost that made as much trouble as that did.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. Would not the circumstances and facts surrounding each have to show gross negligence? It would not be gross negligence if they were to leave a plan of a building out overnight, but it would be gross negligence to leave a plan of battle lying around loose.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, if every man had as much sense as Gen. Lee had there would be no doubt about people getting justice; but this law has to be enforced by a lot of petty officeholders throughout the country, and some one might take it into his head that somebody ought to be punished by imprisonment for 5 or 10 years for losing a blue print such as the gentleman was talking about.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. GARD. The suggestion the gentleman made does not concern the value of the paper lost, but the circumstances under which it was lost; indicating a pure accident. Gross negligence and only gross negligence is punishable under this section.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It looks reasonable that a man who was intrusted with such an important document as that of Gen. Lee would have hung onto it and not taken any chances about losing it.

Mr. GARD. The loss of it was probably a pure accident. I would say that if he had lost it through sheer negligence he should have been punished.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does not the gentleman think that it is gross negligence for a lieutenant general, or chief of staff, to lose a plan of battle prepared by his chief?

Mr. GARD. It is necessary that the circumstances should show that gross negligence had been established.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It looks like a case of gross negligence unless somebody threw Gen. Hill down and took that document away from him after disarming him.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. Gen. Hill, to whom the gentleman has referred, afterwards resided in my State and was president of the university, and his son was chief justice of my State, and repeatedly said that the order never reached his hands at all. The order was lost by some clerk, who wrapped up three cigars in it and laid it down in his tent and went out in a hurry and left it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am not casting reflections on Gen. Hill.

Mr. CARAWAY. The order did not come into Gen. Hill's hands.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. All I know about it is that Gen. Lee issued the order, and some clerk may have got hold of it, as the gentleman says, and used it in wrapping up three cigars. I have no intention to cast reflection on Gen. Hill.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. GLASS. The gentleman will recall that Col. Henderson, whom the gentleman from Missouri quoted the other day, was of the opinion that Gen. Lee was too kind-hearted to be a good soldier.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not cast any reflections on Col. Henderson.

Mr. GLASS. Gen. Hindenberg would not have been so lenient.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And neither would Stonewall Jackson have been. I wish to add that I never before heard that explanation of the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I want to call attention to the fact that the information that is covered by this section may be, and probably would be, of the very highest importance to the Government. It seems to me we ought to leave in this bill a provision of the kind sought to be stricken out. It is not an unusual provision at all. It occurs in a great many criminal statutes. Men are convicted for gross negligence, but it has to be so gross as almost to suggest deliberate intention before a jury will convict. For instance, a person is killed by a man running an automobile recklessly on a crowded street. He may, and under the laws of most States would be, adjudged guilty of manslaughter, and can be sent to State prison. Many of our States have statutes relating to engineers running trains. If they run trains recklessly through a city or where it is well known that they may by such act kill anyone, they may be punished if people are thereby killed. We have, as I have already stated, a number of statutes of that kind. This provision is not revolutionary. It is the ordinary practice to apply such statutes to cases where lack of care occasions the death or serious injury of persons. This section should be, and probably would be, applied only in those cases where something of real consequence ought to be guarded with extreme care and caution. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the forepart of this section penalizes the communicating of any of this information or these documents to any person without proper authority. Then, the latter part proposes to do the same thing with anyone who delivers these documents to one not entitled to receive them—which would be without proper authority—through gross negligence. A man having a document—a signal book, for instance—who delivers it to somebody without proper authority, is he to be punished? Or does the Government have to prove gross negligence when he delivers it?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I know I will not get the information that I ask from the gentleman from Alabama. I think he and I may be on the same side.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Let me call your attention to the fact that the word "willfully" is used before the words "and without proper authority." It says "willfully and without proper authority."

Mr. MANN. He lets somebody have it. Which do you have to prove, gross negligence or that he did it willfully?

Mr. WEBB. Is the gentleman addressing me?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. WEBB. I think he would have to prove that he did it willfully and without proper authority in the one case and in the other case that through gross negligence he permitted it to be removed from its proper place and custody.

Mr. MANN. A man who delivers a thing does it willfully. That is what this says.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. HUDDLESTON) there were—ayes 6, noes 57.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. During any national emergency resulting from a war to which the United States is a party, or from threat of such a war, the President may, by proclamation, declare the existence of such emergency and, by proclamation, prohibit the publishing or communicating of, or the attempting to publish or communicate any information relating to the national defense which, in his judgment, is of such character that it is or might be useful to the enemy. Whoever violates any such prohibition shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 10 years, or both: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to limit or restrict any discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives or the publication of the same.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I desire, if I can, to reach some agreement as to the amount of time to be used on this section. We have been discussing it for two days, practically, and I hope gentlemen will be as reasonable as they can. I would like to know what time we can agree upon.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to have about 10 minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to have 10 minutes on this section myself.

Mr. FESS. I should like five minutes.

Mr. DILLON. I should like five minutes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I am going to offer an amendment——

Mr. WEBB. I will not make any request to dispose of this at this time. I will let it run along for a while.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I should suggest to the gentleman that we should reach some agreement.

Mr. WEBB. Then I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be closed within an hour and a half.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be closed in an hour and a half. Is there objection?

Mr. McCORMICK. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. NORTON. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. MANN. Many Members did not have an opportunity to talk in general debate. I did not myself. Requests have already been made over here for at least two hours on this side on this subject.

Mr. WEBB. I had no idea that more than 18 men would want to speak five minutes apiece on this.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I want 10 minutes.

Mr. WEBB. An hour and a half would take care of 18 gentlemen, five minutes each.

Mr. MANN. Some of them want 10 minutes. I really think the gentleman would be making time by reaching an agreement now to give this side two hours. I do not care how much time the gentleman takes on the other side.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I suggest to the chairman that it is now 20 minutes past 2. Let this debate run the rest of the evening—until 6 o'clock—and two hours to-morrow, and then vote on it. This section is too important to take a snap judgment on.

Mr. WEBB. I want to say to my friend that we have been debating it in the committee for two months, and we have debated it in the House for two days.

Mr. MANN. The fact that it took two months for 21 gentlemen to express their sentiments to one another upon it is of itself a suggestion that 432 Members ought to have more than two hours. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. The House has had two days, and all the debate has been upon this section.

Mr. MANN. I understand.

Mr. WEBB. I have no disposition to press this bill unduly. It is as much your bill as mine or the committee's.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has been liberal about it, and I am not complaining.

Mr. WEBB. I am pushing the bill so that we can get away from here some time in June.

I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto be closed at 6 o'clock.

Mr. MANN. We want two hours' time.

Mr. MADDEN. And we want the control of it over here.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Make it four hours. Why not say that the debate on this section and all amendments thereto shall close at 22 minutes after 6.

Mr. MANN. If you fix a definite time for closing the debate you will lose time, and then you can not divide your time so well.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. All right.

Mr. MANN. Fix the amount of time that shall be consumed.

Mr. BORLAND. Two hours on a side.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That would give two hours on a side.

Mr. BORLAND. Two hours on a side would make four hours. That would bring it to 6.20.

Mr. MANN. I am perfectly willing to make it two hours on a side, though I do not think we will want to sit until 6.20. We ought to provide that the important vote, which will probably be either on the amendment the committee offers or on a motion to strike out, shall be taken to-morrow. We are in the House, and it is almost certain that there will be a roll call.

Mr. WEBB. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be closed within four hours, two hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] or the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the other two hours by myself.

Mr. MANN. Let the gentleman from Minnesota control the time.

Mr. DOWELL. Reserving the right to object, does that mean that we are to vote on these amendments to-morrow morning?

Mr. MANN. We will probably vote on some amendments this afternoon.

Mr. WEBB. The two hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] and two hours by myself.

Mr. BORLAND. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee is this time to be allotted to 5 or 10 minute speeches? It might easily be used up by members of the committee.

Mr. MANN. It will be alloted on this side for 5 and 10 minute speeches.

Mr. WEBB. The members of the committee have spoken about all they care to speak, unless some questions are asked.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] asks unanimous consent that at the expiration of four hours' debate, two hours of which shall be controlled by himself and the other two hours by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD], the debate on this section and all amendments thereto shall terminate. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. That means that we may have some amendments read, but the time shall not be taken out of the time for debate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman from Missouri proceeds I would like to know if we are to be permitted to offer our amendments so that the discussion can proceed on the section and amendments thereto?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia). The Chair thinks that would be well if it is the desire of the House.

Mr. LENROOT. Reserving the right to object, I do not think that the House will come to the conclusion that it ought to come to if we are going to have all of these amendments read and then vote on 40 or 50 at the end of the debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair said if it was the desire of the House the Chair would submit them in that way.

Mr. MANN. I do not think that anybody can understand the amendments submitted in that way.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I send the following amendment to the desk.

Page 36, strike out the whole of section 4.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, those who have read the history of the adoption of the Constitution know that a great many great Americans, led by Patrick Henry in Virginia, while in New York George Clinton, 18 years governor and finally Vice President, led the fight, were opposed to adopting the Constitution on the ground that it had every facility in it for finally making the Federal Government a despotism.

In Virginia, even with the great influence of Washington, the ratification was carried by a very small majority—by a scratch. In New York they fought it for months, and ratified it only after the necessary nine States had ratified it. I am not going to enlarge on that, except to say that they never would have got the Constitution ratified at all except by promising to put into it certain propositions by way of amendments, and the First Congress submitted 10 constitutional amendments. They were all ratified, and they ought to be at the first end of the Constitution instead of the last as a bill of rights.

The first one of these amendments is this:

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press.

I undertake to say, without the fear of successful contradiction, that those words I have read are the most important part of the Constitution of the United States, bar none. [Applause.] I do not set up to be a great constitutional lawyer, although I do believe that I know a little about the Constitution; and I believe that this press-censorship section in here is in flat violation of the Constitution of the United States. [Applause.] A few of the newspaper editors abuse their privilege, slander people, lie about them, and villify them like pickpockets, sometimes for doing their plain duty; and within the last 10 days I have received as much of that slush as any man that ever lived in the world. [Laughter.] But all the abuse and slander and lying they can do will not make me desert the principle that underlies this Government—that we shall have free speech in this country. [Applause.] I am for free speech on principle not only for Representatives and Senators but for everybody else, the high and the lowly alike.

It is a little peculiar that the other day, when some of us were doing something certain editors did not want done, we were denounced in every kind of villainous terms that could be applied to us because we did not stand by the President; but, marvelous to relate, when it comes to a question where they get their own toes pinched they do not stand by the President. [Laughter and applause.] Very much depends on whose ox is gored.

The other day the President of the United States wrote to Arthur Brisbane, the highest-priced newspaper man in the world and one of the most brilliant, a letter that showed that he did not intend to harness up these editors. Now, everybody believes a thing when the President states it—that is a fact. [Laughter.] Well, there is a great difference between a fact and a theory; you may not believe his theories, but I suppose we all think he is a man of veracity, and he is a man of ability, and as far as enforcing this law is concerned, he will stick to what he said to Brisbane. I would be perfectly willing to have him pass on such things personally.

But the President of the United States would not have anything to do with this thing, not a thing in the world until the last resort. Some subaltern—and a good many men in this world act very peculiarly when vested with a little brief authority—some subaltern, or a multitude of them, because there will be a multitude of officers in this war, will harness these people up. They will undertake to have them punished without the President of the United States knowing a single thing about what is going on.

I will tell you it has been bruited in this House that there was a combination between the news agencies and the great newspapers not a great while ago to shut out all information on one side of a question. I do not know whether that is true or not, and I am not going to affirm or deny it, and I express no opinion about it. But I say, if that thing ever happens, then the public press becomes a menace to the liberties of the American people instead of their palladium. [Applause.]

I have read a good deal of Thomas Jefferson's writings—everything I ever saw or heard of that he wrote. He made some extreme statements, and he was a great hand to make epigrams. He said that he had rather live in a country with a free press and no government than to live in a country with a government and with no free press. And I say the same thing here to-day. [Applause.]

In a general way I think the newspapers try to do what is right. I do not believe there is a reputable newspaper in America, not one, that would voluntarily give out information detrimental to the Government of the United States to help the enemies of this Republic. That is a broad statement, but I believe it. Of course, there are black sheep among the editors, like there are among every other association of people in the world, who once in a while may violate the confidence and give out matter that ought not to be given out, but they are not in the reputable class.

I have been in this world a good while and I have had much to do with newspaper men, correspondents, and so forth. I never yet had but one of them violate a confidence. They come into my office and they talk to me freely about a great many things; I give them information that I do not want published; I caution them not to publish it, and they do not publish it. That much is due to these newspaper men. I do not think this law will be abused in the hands of President Wilson, but he is not going to live forever. There will be Presidents after him, and I hope all of them will be great men and good men; but you never can tell, and I am teetotally opposed to putting into the hands of any man a bridle which he may place upon the free expression of the opinions of Americans in this country either by word of mouth or in letters or in any other species of communication or in the public press. [Applause.]

There are laws against slander and libel. Of course, they do not amount to very much in the case of a man. If a newspaper libels a woman she can recover damages, but a man has to have a remarkably good case in order to recover in a libel suit against a newspaper. We are in a period of transition. It used to be that if a man lied about you you would go out after him. [Laughter.] They used to fight duels in this town. The last Congressman killed here was Cilley, of Maine, killed by Graves, of Kentucky. That day is past, but we have not progressed far enough for a jury in this country, as a rule, to give to a man substantial damages in a suit for libel or slander; but that time is coming, just as certain as that the sun will rise to-morrow morning and set to-morrow night, because justice demands it.

Let us suppose that some upstart is serving under President Wilson. Everyone knows that the soldiers during the Spanish War were fed embalmed beef, unfit to eat, and everyone knows that Col. Roosevelt, then, I think, a lieutenant colonel, got up a round robin, in violation of all military rules ever provided in this world, but by that round robin he stirred up public sentiment until the outrage and curse of embalmed beef were cured.

Let us suppose that a man writes an editorial condemning or criticizing the food that is provided for the soldiers in the war, or any other thing about their comfort, will it be said that he shall be harnessed up by one of these 8 by 10 upstarts who are going around enforcing military law? Shall an editor be jailed for exposing that? To do so would be a crime against both our soldiers and our institutions. To say that they shall not be able to criticize a general who is not fit to command troops is another crime, and here you are fixing it so that any malicious person in the whole neighborhood can dig out some little paragraph somewhere that some editor put into his paper which is not pleasing to the fellows who are running the show and have him fined and imprisoned for that. It is better to let the newspapers lie what they do lie than it is to undertake to have a governmental censorship of the public press. What people want is facts—real news—the facts on both sides of a question. Many newspapers should have a house cleaning of their own and certainly make up their plans to give both sides of a case. I never think about the press of the United States that I do not recall the lines from Shakespeare:

> O, it is excellent
> To have a giant's strength; but it is tyrannous
> To use it like a giant.

And I think we will all get along a great deal better to be careful about muzzling the public press of the United States, and I am in favor of the motion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] to strike out the censorship section or rewrite it entirely. [Applause.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Several gentlemen have offered amendments that are pending at the Clerk's desk, as I understand it, and would they not be in order before the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is but one amendment at the Clerk's desk which has been reported, and that is the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I know; but that proposes to strike out the whole section.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes; that is the only amendment at the desk.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If that is voted on first, as I understand it, if it should be agreed to, no opportunity will be afforded to offer the other amendments that have been proposed. I have an amendment which I have sent up to the Clerk's desk and I would like to have it considered. It involves only a portion of the section.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As soon as the gentleman obtains time he can offer his amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is it necessary to obtain permission from the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] to offer an amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Or get recognition to do so.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman could do it later, but not now.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, is not an amendment to perfect a section of higher rank than an amendment to strike out the section?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is.

Mr. BORLAND. If the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] rises to offer an amendment to perfect the section, would it not have a right over the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. When the time comes for offering amendments; yes.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, at this point I desire to offer an amendment to section 4 of the bill, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 36 strike out all after the figure "4" in line 1 down to and including the word "both" in line 11 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"During a war in which the United States is engaged, or during a national emergency threatening war, the President is authorized from time to time to designate by proclamation the character of information concerning the national defense which, in his opinion, would be useful to the enemy, and thereupon it shall be unlawful for any person without proper authority to publish or communicate such information. Whoever violates this section shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 10 years, or both."

Mr. VOLSTEAD. May I ask the gentleman if he intends to leave out the proviso in this section?

Mr. WEBB. No; if this amendment goes in the section the proviso remains in the section. Mr. Speaker, the debate on this section has shown that in the minds of some good lawyers there is some doubt about the constitutionality of the clause in the section. I find that most lawyers balk at the suggestion that the President shall make proclamation and make a violation of the President's proclamation a crime, so in order to avoid that objection, and so far as deputizing or delegating the question of power to anyone, I have redrafted that portion of the section, and simply give the President the power, for which there are hundreds of precedents, which has been given to the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Postmaster General, and the President—to give the President power to designate the character of certain information by proclamation from time to time which in his opinion would be useful to the enemy, and then the Congress says anyone who publishes or communicates that information without proper authority shall be guilty of a crime. I think that clearly removes the constitutional objection which some good lawyers have raised to that part of the bill. Therefore, I offer the amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I will.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What character of authority is contemplated by the expression "without proper authority"?

Mr. WEBB. That expression was suggested by my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. That is this, where a Government official has information that he ought to transmit or communicate to some other Government official, of course he would get authority from his superior officer to transmit it to another official. We thought that suggestion was a good one, and, therefore, have adopted it as the gentleman from Illinois suggested.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman will readily see under the provisions of the amendment, after proclamation had been issued denying publication of certain matters, it would leave the newspapers in this country in doubt as to what authority would be necessary for them to get in order to be within the provisions of the act.

Mr. WEBB. No; I do not think it would at all.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But authority from whom—who is to dispense the authority?

Mr. WEBB. His superior officer or the President himself. For instance, here are our tentative allies; here are the commissioners from England and France; there are certain things about the national defense which ought to be transmitted and communicated to those gentlemen. It will be done, and would be done if this section were in force, if the proper authorities should exercise their authority of communication to them; but if it were in force without such provision, you might make a Government official acting in perfect good faith guilty of a crime by the communication of information concerning the national defense that ought to be communicated to those gentlemen.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Would not the censors be the men to give that authority?

Mr. WEBB. No; the censor would have nothing to do with it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The censor is the man who determines what is published and what is not.

Mr. WEBB. We will leave that for the President to designate—the character of the information that ought to be published. Now, Mr. Speaker, that is all I care to explain to the House why the committee adopted this amendment in order to eliminate the constitutional objection that has been made.

Mr. DOWELL. May I ask unanimous consent to have the amendment again reported? We could not get it all?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

Mr. WEBB. I will say to my friend that I will send him a copy.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will that answer the gentleman's purpose?

Mr. DOWELL. As far as I am individually concerned.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will again be reported.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEBB. I yield.

Mr. DOWELL. What does the amendment mean "without proper authority"?

Mr. WEBB. I just explained that to the gentleman from Alabama. That is the part which was suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and I think it is a good suggestion because there might be times when certain information concerning the national defense ought to be transmitted from one officer of the United States to another, or to our allies, English or French, and without some clause of that kind a man would make himself liable to a penalty by innocently violating the section.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] changes the form of the section. The present form of the section, in my judgment, is clearly unconstitutional; probably the form now submitted by the gentleman is constitutional, though it does not, of course, change the real purpose of the section. I think I shall vote for the amendment. I feel very confident I shall vote to strike out the section. It is very natural that the War Department—anybody—conducting a war wants to keep all the information so that it can not reach the enemy, and many times they want to keep information so that it shall not reach the people. I believe the people of the United States engaged in war are entitled to know what is going on. [Applause.] We send our boys into camps. We ought to know how they are being treated in the camps. We send them to the front. We want to know what they are doing at the front and how they are being treated there. The enemy will know where they are when they come in contact with the enemy. They are not likely to obtain information to know just where they are sent regardless of any provision of law, because information of that sort must emanate from the War Department, and if they do not give it out it will not become public. I read a statement in this morning's paper, from a distinguished member of the President's Cabinet—I do not know whether it is information or not—which was made for the purpose of influencing the public sentiment of this country.

But if you provide by law that such things can not be published no one can endeavor to influence public sentiment. Of course, the bill provides you may criticize acts or policies of the Government, but if you say in addition to that you can furnish no facts, what good does the criticism do? Nobody knows what the facts are upon which the criticism is based. The best way for us to conduct war is to let the people know what is going on. [Applause.] It would be wiser perhaps, even in England, if the people there knew better the conditions in regard to the war both at home and abroad. We want to know not only in reference to the war, but we want to know in reference to the food supply, the transportation facilities, the manufacture of munitions of war. The War Department will not want to let any information percolate to the people. They believe in conducting everything secretly. I think that in a Republic like ours it is wiser to trust the people. I am not afraid if the people know what the situation is, but they will back up the Government and win the war; but if they are kept in ignorance no one knows what we will do. [Applause.] If we are defeated at the front, we ought to know it. If we win at the front, we ought to know it. If our boys are killed at the front, the lists ought to be published. I am not in favor of letting a clerk in the War Department say it will not be wise to publish a list of the dead; that it will not be wise to publish a list of those who are taken prisoners. Give the people the information, and if we have trust in our country then we must have faith in our people to have the information. And while we keep information from the enemy, which they will probably get anyhow, we will keep information from our own people which they have a right to know. [Applause.]

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I believe in the complete freedom of the press, but not in that unhaltered license which gives it the privilege of vilifying all persons that do not obey its imperious mandates. There is an old and true saying that if you give a calf rope it will hang itself, and I believe if a newspaper is given sufficient latitude and at the same time is held answerable to just and proper libel laws it will finally reach the end of its rope and hang itself. I was formerly, many years ago, a newspaper editor myself, but I reformed, and have not been guilty since. [Laughter.] The majority of the newspapers of this country are conducted by high-minded, honorable, and patriotic men, but there are black sheep in every flock, and the newspaper fraternity has rather more than its share in that kind of animals.

It seems to me that newspapers can be punished if they make statements or publish matters that will give aid, comfort, and information to the enemy in time of war under the section of the Constitution defining treason. That section defines treason as follows:

> Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort.

By the provisions of the pending measure, if any individual gives aid and comfort to the enemy by knowingly conveying by letter, word of mouth, or otherwise, any information of value, such person is amenable to punishment and I believe he would be liable to punishment under the law of treason. It is just as culpable and the same degree of crime for a newspaper to publish matters that are calculated to assist the enemy, and I think that is true without the passage of this bill.

There are, however, two sides to every question, and while newspapers may be a great power for good, they may also become a greater power of evil. A just and free press is a palladium of liberty, and a shield and buckler of national defense, while on the other hand, a corrupt and venal press may become the instrument of tyranny and oppression.

I am astonished that any of our recently highly excited compulsionist friends should fail to support this measure. Last week we were assured by many of the conscription newspapers, and evidently some Members of this House thought the same way, judging by their remarks, that it is near or quite high treason to oppose any bill the President is believed to favor, but now the shoe is pinching the other foot, and such newspapers and Members of the House are valiantly and vigorously opposing this measure drafted by the Department of State under the direction of the President. Mr. KAHN, of California, of recent ultracompulsion notoriety, is foremost among that number. Mr. CLARK of Missouri last week said it was "Kneel, Julius; arise, Sir Julius." I fear if the gentleman does not mend his ways it will soon be, "Kneel, Sir Julius; arise, Julius."

The press should be free to intelligently, justly, and decently express its honest opinions, and to freely criticize the public acts of public officials, but the law should put a lock on the lips of libel. The press that fails to criticize the public acts of public officials in a decent manner, fails in its duty to the country. Nevertheless, a great many newspapers bend the knee of suppliance to high official power, and unmercifully lash those in lower and less fortunate positions. So far as I am advised, few, if any, newspapers in my part of Kentucky have vilified Congress because of any position it has taken on public matters.

I desire to read a portion of an editorial from a newspaper that was afflicted last week with the unmental rabies because some Members opposed the compulsion bill and thereby, according to this veracious chronicler, opposed the President. That paper is now in the same state of mind about this espionage bill, only the shoe is on the other foot, and it is opposing the espionage bill and, therefore, opposing the President. That newspaper is the Louisville Courier-Journal. Mr. Watterson is the nominal editor of that paper, but does not spend much of his time in Louisville, and does but little work on the paper. He has built for it a reputation on which that paper is now existing, but when he is gathered to his fathers the old granny of Green Street will find the journalistic way a hard road to travel and full of stumps. That paper in the editorial, a part of which I will read, paid its respects to Speaker CLARK, Mr. DENT, Mr. HUDDLESTON, and to Mr. FIELDS and myself in lurid, if not lovable, language. Now, listen. This is an editorial from which I shall read in reference to myself, and is headed, "A voice from the cave." [Laughter.] That means the Mammoth Cave in my district, the greatest cave in the world. It appears that I am a cave dweller, according to this paper. [Laughter.] In this editorial the following language is used in reference to Daniel Webster:

> He was a noble orator, a sublime prose poet, and a learned constitutional lawyer, but in worldly wisdom and the practical affairs of life he had scarce wit enough to take himself in out of the wet when it rained, and was all his life dependent on his friends for support.

Further in this editorial the declaration is made that—

> Mr. THOMAS is almost as hopelessly antiquated and provincial as Mr. CHAMP CLARK.

And it further relieves its pent-up feelings by stating:

> Mr. THOMAS does not need to tell us, speaking of those who have been converted to the selective-draft system, that he is not one of those who have suddenly seen a great light, for, bless his simple soul, he represents the Mammoth Cave in Congress, the wondrous Mammoth Cave, which never changes and where all is dark.

The elevator man or office boy must have written that editorial, though I doubt if either would now, on reflection, admit its authorship. I am at all times delighted to learn and be corrected of my simple ignorance, though I am astonished to be informed that Webster was a fool, with scarce wit enough to take himself in out of the wet. The Courier-Journal says so, and, of course, that makes it true. In its superior wisdom it knows all things and some other things in addition. I am not much surprised that the Courier-Journal believes I am simple and dark, because I do not think as it does on the matter of compulsion, and compares my mental darkness to that of Mammoth Cave. Now, Mammoth Cave can be lighted by electricity and made nearly as light as day. It is not necessary for the person who afflicted the public with that editorial to enter any cave to be in darkness. He is, and will always remain, in total darkness, even on top of the earth and in the sunlight. [Applause.]

The editorial states that I am almost as hopelessly antiquated and provincial as Mr. Speaker CLARK. This is the same Mr. CLARK that paper so vigorously supported for the nomination for President before and at the Baltimore convention, and that may have been one of the chief causes of Mr. CLARK's defeat. After the nomination of Mr. Wilson that paper, while pretending to support him, smote him under the fifth rib at every available opportunity. The voice was the voice of Jacob, but the hand was that of Esau, and it kept up the same course of conduct all through the administration of Mr. Wilson until the advent of the compulsion measure.

The Courier-Journal is a first-class newspaper, so far as its news columns are concerned, but it can not help that, as the news is furnished to it by the Associated Press and its correspondents. Otherwise, in the absence of Mr. Watterson, it gropes in narrow-minded bigotry and provincial darkness. It has made governors, Senators, and Representatives by opposing them. It is seldom right on any public question, and has lost the greater part of its political prestige in Kentucky. Bolting the Democratic Party has become habitual with it, and the Democracy of Kentucky no longer looks to it for political guidance. It is as fussy as an old hen with one chicken when bugs and worms are scarce and hard to find. It is usually as busy as a bird dog full of fleas, flinging mixed metaphors and "bad grammar" at the heads of those who have been so fortunate as to incur its displeasure.

I want to support the President, and shall do so in all essential particulars. Most of the newspapers that were declaring that support of the President is the one and supreme test of loyalty and patriotism are opposed to his views on this important question. According to these intelligent chroniclers, those Members of Congress who do not vote as they dictate, whether they support the President or not, are not patriotic.

The Washington Herald, which last week was ultracompulsionist, has recently seen a new light. The Washington papers are merely local papers, almost devoid of general news, and when not engaged in vilifying Congress are usually busy promoting some scheme to loot the Public Treasury. [Laughter and applause.] If my memory serves me correctly, that paper is among those which claim the credit or discredit, according to the point of view, of being responsible for the idea of latter-day compulsion. I think it applied the word "slacker" to persons who did not support its ideas of conscription; but when it sees the draft may likely strike Washington it wants to increase the army of slackers, and editorially declares that Washington is ready to do her bit, but feels that she should do it voluntarily. "Do her bit" is quite English, "dontcher know," and has recently become very popular in conscription circles.

In a recent editorial that paper declared:

> Washingtonians have no desire to be slackers. They have responded nobly in the past. They will respond in this crisis. But would it not be wise for the congressional conferees to give this question some thought? We have an exceptional number of Government employees who are doing civilian duty of importance, and can not be spared for actual fighting. No other city is confronted with a similar condition. It surely should be taken into consideration when the conference report is considered, since Washington, while ready and willing to do her bit, and probably more than her portion, feels that she should do it voluntarily and not because of hastily considered amendments that are inequitable.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the gentleman give me five minutes?

Mr. GARD. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, you will observe that while the Herald states that Washington is ready and willing to do her bit she feels that she should do it voluntarily. [Laughter.] The people of Washington, according to this, must be falling over each other to volunteer, and should not be conscripted. They want to volunteer. [Laughter.] When "preparedness" excitement held full sway in this Capital City the people had a procession miles long and 80,000 strong. The bands played, the flags fluttered to the breeze, the drums beat, the bugles blowed, the fifes screamed, and the pretty girls marched and smiled their sweetest, and of course marched the boys, and everything was lovely and the goose hung high, and all went merry as a marriage bell. But when it came to the stern reality of facing another kind of music, and enlisting for service in possible war where bullets might be encountered other than those found in the ammunition wagon, that enthusiasm cooled and that mighty procession faded away like a dream of things that were and are not. It was with the greatest difficulty and only after much advertising that any enlistments to speak of were secured in Washington for the Mexican campaign.

This measure is of doubtful constitutionality, and if not constitutional should be made so before it is enacted into law. I do not believe that for the sake of coining money the newspapers should be permitted to publish matters that will give aid and information to the enemy. I do not believe that the Constitution intended to or does give such freedom to the press as to permit it to publish such news as will aid and encourage the enemy. No self-respecting paper will do so, and those that are sufficiently venal and corrupt to do so should be made to feel the heavy hand of the law.

I believe the press as a whole is honest and patriotic and lovers of flag and country, but laws are needed to regulate the corrupt and unpatriotic. This Congress, in addition to enacting laws to regulate the press, should also, in addition, pass severe libel laws applicable to papers with an interstate circulation so that the constant vilification of Congressmen and other public men generally may be at least to some extent ended. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky returns two minutes.

Mr. GARD. I will ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] to use some time.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I trust the motion to strike out section 4 will prevail. We need no such broad power.

I stated the other day that the President already has authority to control the very thing which it is sought to control in this section, and I direct the attention of the House to the official order, dated April 28, wherein the President puts a censorship on the telegraph and cable companies of the Nation and couches his announcement in issuing that order in this language:

> By virtue of the power vested in me under the Constitution and the joint resolution passed by Congress April 6, 1917, declaring a state of war to exist, it is ordered that all companies—
> And so forth—
>
> are hereby prohibited from "transmitting messages by cable or telegraph"—
> And so on.

Now, this section as it is drawn will result in the establishment of a censor board, and I read in the press and have heard from various sources that there already is a censor board in existence, and that a Mr. Creel is at the head of this board. I have also read and have been informed by gentlemen who would seem to be in a position to know that there has been placed in a position of trust on that board a certain gentleman who formerly held an unofficial position of trust in the executive department of this Government, a certain Mr. Price, formerly a newspaper reporter, who was at one time in the press room at the White House, who admitted in the "leak" investigation that he had betrayed the trust imposed on him, or at least that he had given to certain financial houses advance information in relation to the messages and orders of the President.

That is the sort of man who might have the authority to say under section 4 whether a newspaper could publish information because, perhaps, it might be useful to the enemy, and I assume that possibly he might also have the authority to say that it might be useful to certain financial houses whom he formerly served.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. POU. I do not think the gentleman from Massachusetts should make the statement as to Mr. Price that he has betrayed any secrets by giving advance information. He made no such admission as that. If the gentleman will examine the record, he will find that to be the case.

Mr. WALSH. I have examined the record, and I find that Mr. Price admitted that he took pay for information that was intrusted to him of a confidential nature, which he gave out before it was made public to certain brokerage houses and received pay for this service.

Mr. POU. Mr. Price's admission was that he did give advance information, but that he gave such information as other gentlemen engaged in the newspaper business might have obtained and did obtain, and that the information was not, as he regarded it, confidential. I think it is only fair to Mr. Price to say that.

Mr. WALSH. I want to be fair, but I will say further that whether he gave advance information or took pay for it or not, he was dismissed from the position which he held as the result of his action after this "leak" investigation was made by the Rules Committee of the House.

Mr. POU. That is very true, and I have no word of defense for the conduct of Mr. Price in accepting pay while he was doing newspaper work at the White House. But he should be treated fairly.

Mr. MANN. It shows the character of the man.

Mr. WALSH. As I stated, there is a censorship board already, I believe, in existence; and under this section, if it is allowed to remain in the bill, if this man is connected with it he might have charge of the giving out for publication the information which would be allowed to be stated and published.

Mr. SHERLEY. Can the gentleman state on what authority he makes the statement that Mr. Price is connected with this bureau?

Mr. WALSH. I state it on the authority of having read it in the press, and of having been told by several gentlemen on that side of the House as well as on this side of the House that they had information that Mr. Price has been or is now officially connected with the bureau over which Mr. Creel is in charge. It is hard to credit, but that is the report that has been given credence by others besides myself for several days.

Mr. MANN. It seems unbelievable to honest men.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, the so-called censorship feature of this bill, which has been made the subject of so much criticism, appears to be predicated upon the theory that the American press is to be treated as if it were an enemy of the country; that it is open to the suspicion of disloyalty and contemplates acts of treason against the welfare of it. It seems to me that that is a very dangerous foundation upon which to build any legislative authority such as this measure designs to place in the hands of the Executive and the officials of this Government. In all matters affecting the interests of the United States and its people I, for one, believe that the newspapers are not only painstakingly consistent in their patriotic obligations but that they would be the first agency to expose treachery in any form and on the part of any person. I do not recall a single instance, nor do I believe that any Member of either House of Congress can point to any act of disloyalty on the part of a newspaper or periodical other than those which have been engaged in the promotion of dangerous propagandas whose inspiration is so unmistakably clear as to render them ineffective in formulating public opinion. I have been a Member of the House for 16 years. During that time I frequently have had to take members of the newspaper profession, of the press gallery of this House, into my confidence. I have told them matters I believed they should know but that I did not think the country should know just at that particular time. Not in a single instance was my confidence betrayed. I am sure that every Member of the House has had a similar experience. I feel that I can not let this occasion go by without commenting upon the high sense of honor that pervades the ranks of the newspaper profession here in the Capitol. The newspapers, in my opinion, constitute the chief agency through which acts of disloyalty and treachery usually become known. They further constitute one of the most important agencies in the organization of our system of government to which the President, his Cabinet advisers, and other officials of the Government almost daily appeal for support of official undertakings designed to arouse the spirit of patriotism in the people and to awaken them to a full responsibility of their duty as citizens of the United States. To include them indiscriminately among conspirators, marplots, nationals of unfriendly countries, spies, paid agents of offenders against our national laws, destroyers of our peace of mind, and insidious assailants of those things which are most sacred to the American heart is to cast unjust discredit upon a worthy and valuable ally of the Government and to display a woeful lack of appreciation of the tremendous services rendered by the newspapers. Whatever can be said of newspapers, they are rarely if ever insidious or skulking. Their offenses, if they can be called such, are just to the contrary. They do not publish their editorials or news articles for the purpose of giving aid and comfort to an enemy, but to call attention to evils that the people should be advised of in order to make the protection of both the Government and themselves more secure and certain. There may be some newspapers that could print a single issue intended to inform the enemies of their country of the plans of their Government relating to the movement of military and naval forces and to disclose secrets that might be of value to such enemies, but I do not believe that there is a single newspaper in the United States which would do so. For my part, I would rather the newspapers should be permitted to censor themselves, for I am quite sure that they can be trusted to do so with less injury to the interests of the people of the country than might result from the attempt of the Government to restrict their discussion and criticism of acts of which the people should have the fullest knowledge obtainable. It is entirely inconceivable that the President, who has frequently advocated "pitiless publicity" in the discussion of Government affairs; who not very long ago most ardently declared that the Government should be restored to the control of the people; who on more than one occasion has proclaimed "the open-door policy" in the administration of the affairs of New Jersey and of the Federal Government; who has proclaimed himself and his administration the servants and not the masters of the people—it is decidedly unthinkable that he should have any sympathy with or give his support to the promotion of a legislative undertaking designed to accomplish results diametrically the opposite. Taking our cue from him, I therefore believe it our duty to the American press to credit them with motives as highly patriotic as our own and to treat them as friends and not as criminals to be dealt with on the same plane with secret intriguers, conspirators, plotters, and spies. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman does not appear to be on the floor.

Mr. WEBB. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY].

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I sent to the Clerk's desk a few moments ago an amendment which I desired to offer, in order to call attention to a phrase or two in the original section. It proposes to strike out the words "or communicating" in line 5 and the words "or communicates" in line 6. I desire to express my opposition to the dangerous proposition of using words which are incapable of exact meaning in a section dealing with specific rights guaranteed in the Constitution and won at the expense of countless battles and incalculable effort.

During the general debate I asked a number of gentlemen for the meaning of that word "communicate," and I could not secure a single definition that really defined. I do not believe an exact definition of that word "communicate" as used in this connection can be given. Yet it is here to be enforced, and severe penalties hinge upon it.

Mr. Speaker, I am willing to admit that the Constitution provides for the exercise of war powers by this Government by which any or all steps necessary to self-defense may be taken, even though they be expressly prohibited during times of peace.

I am willing to admit also that the rights of the individual, no matter how sacred they may be, must always be subservient to the Nation's welfare. The rights of the individual are not rights in any just sense if their exercise endangers the welfare and best interests of a majority of the people.

But admitting all this, it is still true that here is a question of policy which is of supreme importance to every citizen in the United States: Shall the Congress at this juncture limit freedom of speecr, freedom of the press, and freedom of assemblage?

I contend that such a policy is unwise and dangerous. This measure is called the "espionage" bill and is presumed to be intended to punish spies and conspirators and treacherous persons in our midst. But the very reason the activities of these persons are dangerous is because they are performed in stealth and secrecy. The spy once known and exposed is no longer a menace. Once he is known for what he really is, the possibilities of his working harm are taken away.

Now, shall we include in such a measure this section which compels darkness and secrecy at a time when, above all things, light is needed? Shall we say that the people are not to be trusted with full knowledge of the conduct of their own Government? While certain military information may well be withheld because of its possible benefits to our enemy, I am absolutely opposed to a provision which would include many other things beside military informaton. I want to see this section stricken out or trimmed to the bone of military news, for there never was a time when full knowledge of the conduct of government was more needed by Americans than to-day.

Men have been afraid of the light in the past but always it has been proven that light is the best disinfectant and the best policeman. Scientists agree that the germs of tuberculosis and yellow fever can not live in the sunlight. It is equally true that the germs of treason and treachery can not live in the sunlight. If you will turn on the light, you will find that there is red blood enough in America to withstand any disease that may assail it in this hour of peril. [Applause.]

I have been interested in reading in Knight's History of England a recital of the struggle necessary before street lamps could be erected in the streets of London. When the attempt was made, in the sixteenth century, every imaginable catastrophe was foretold. Then, in 1807, when the effort was made to substitute gas lights for oil lamps the battle had to be fought over again. Men said it would mean the destruction of the whale-oil industry as well as many other industries dependent on the oil-lighting system. But the advocates for more and better light won, and Knight in describing the victory uses this significant statement:

These adventurers in light did more for the prevention of crime than the Government had done in centuries.

Why should we now attempt to cloak any activity of this Government in darkness. Should we not rather adopt the policy of full and free publicity, trusting the American people when they are fully informed to act in wise and patriotic fashion? That attitude would look vastly better in a measure to deal with spies and those who love darkness because their deeds are evil.

But, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, there is another issue involved in this controversy. We have talked much of mobilization during the past few weeks. We have said that America and all her resources are to be mobilized for the conduct of this war. We have passed the Army bill for the mobilization of our fighting force. We have passed the bond bill for the mobilization of a stupendous sum of money. But equally as important as these is the mobilization of public opinion. The mind and heart and conscience of the American citizenship must be brought to bear unitedly upon this great conflict and its possibilities.

That can not be done unless the people know and understand exactly what is going on in the departments of their Government. Public opinion can not be sane and wholesome and effective unless the facts are known and full freedom given to discuss and argue and criticize. The kind of unity that comes from ignorance of the truth and inability to fully consider it is a fraudulent unity sure to end in danger and disaster.

I am not concerned about the rights of the newspapers, but I am concerned in the rights of the people to free speech and free utterance and neither is possible if freedom of the press is destroyed or unduly restricted. I am sure that undue interference with the rights of free press and free speech will be the greatest possible barrier to a mobilization of public opinion in this country. It is natural for any person to be suspicious of the hidden and the secret. The very fact that any thing is kept shrouded in darkness gives reason for doubts and misgivings. If we desire a united and invincible public opinion in America, we must make sure that we do not prevent knowledge being given to the people who must make up the public opinion.

Mr. Speaker, let us make every true American a guardian of American interests by giving him the truth, upon which to base patriotic and efficient action. Merchants used to close their shutters at night and put out the lights in the belief that such action would prevent the depredations of marauders. But they found instead that burglars worked all the more securely behind such screens and in such darkness. Now business men find it safer to leave all lights burning at night, with windows unshuttered. Then every passer-by becomes a watchman and helps protect the property from those who would steal or destroy.

I have listened to gentlemen who declared that any effort by those who advocated the principle of universal service in the Army bill to defend free speech and free press is inconsistent. I contend, rather, that it is the truest consistency, and that the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] is abolutely consistent when he favors both, as he has just done.

We stand on the fundamental principle that every citizen owes a sacred obligation to serve his country. It is not a matter of choice but of obligation. The Government, representing all the people, must decide what the service shall be. But the very fact that that Government, as the agent of all the people, shall have that power carries with it the obligation that the Government shall work only in the open, so that its creator, the people, shall know and understand every action taken. I am not afraid of centralized power as long as the people remain master of those who use the power. And if they are to remain master they must be enlightened and possessed of full knowledge, else they have no way of forming wise and intelligent judgment.

Mr. Speaker, let us trust the people. Let us provide more light instead of less. Over every place where public business of vital importance to the public is transacted let us place the motto, "Let there be light." Instead of keeping proper public information from the people I believe we should establish an organized publicity bureau, whose entire duty would be to keep the people of America informed of the conduct of this Government in every detail, except only those military facts, possession of which might be of help to the enemy.

The people are not afraid of even bitter facts and they have the right to know both good news and bad as the progress of this war continues. They know, and this Congress should know as well, that it is the "truth which alone can make men free." [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], a member of the committee.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, there is no opportunity within the limits of the time assigned me to discuss the constitutionality of this section. I shall content myself by saying that I have no doubt of its constitutionality. I think those gentlemen who talk about the unconstitutionality of this provision are merely opposed to the policy of the law. They do not fear the law may be unconstitutional but do fear it may be constitutional, and those who violate it will not be protected by the Constitution. [Applause.] It strikes me as the most absurd thing of which I ever heard—and I have heard some very absurd things since I have been a Member of this House—that because the editors are patriotic and are going to abide by a reasonable censorship they ought not therefore to be humiliated by having a law passed forbidding them to publish those things harmful to the country and helpful to the enemy.

Carry that argument to its logical conclusion and you reach this situation: I take it that no Member intends to steal hogs—I am presuming, as I have no information [laughter]—and yet each of you live in a State that makes it a felony to steal hogs. Did I hear the gentleman from Missouri address me?

Mr. MEEKER. No; I was talking to the gentleman beside me.

Mr. CARAWAY. We live so near Missouri we had to pass that among our first statutes. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BORLAND. And the gentleman expected to get his hogs back?

Mr. CARAWAY. We never would have had them to get back if we had neglected passing this statute.

Mr. RUSSELL. The gentleman was born in Missouri——

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, yes; I have told the gentleman that I was born in Missouri, but I left there when I was 6 weeks old. I would have gone sooner if I had realized where I was. [Laughter.] I was not a precocious child. [Laughter.] But the thing I was trying to say is that the newspapers take the position that they ought to be above the law, because they intend to be patriotic. That was the argument made by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] a moment ago, that to keep this section in the bill would be impugning the motives of the newspapers. It is no more an imputation against their patriotism than it is against all of us to put in the bill that you shall not communicate information hurtful to this country and helpful to the enemy. But I started to say each of you live in a State where hog stealing is a felony, and yet I hardly think you look upon that law as a reflection on yourself.

What is the difference and what came over the spirit of your dreams so suddenly? One of the gentlemen who moved to strike out the provision was in the committee one day only, and that was the day we agreed to this section. The other gentleman who said that the committee ought to be a committee on punctuation was there a part of one day, and he it was that wanted to put in a comma where somebody else had put a semicolon. [Laughter.]

What is the use of deceiving yourselves, gentlemen; and why shed so many tears over the freedom of the press and talk about the newspaper editors' patriotism being impugned by this proposed law? If your arguments were sound, the other provisions of the bill impute a lack of patriotism and a lack of honor to every citizen under the flag, because the bill forbids everyone giving hurtful information to our enemies. If your argument is sound and should prevail here, we ought to wipe off our statute books all criminal laws, because a law against murder would be an imputation against the peaceable citizenship of the country who need no law to keep them from committing murder. You can not be consistent if you say this section imputes bad and disloyal motives to newspaper editors and does not impugn the motives of everyone else, and therefore you will exempt from its operations the newspapers.

You gentlemen who have so ardently defended the newspapers say that there are things newspapers should not and will not publish. I am going to say this, that no honest newspaper editor who is willing to abide by a reasonable censorship, a reasonable restraint of his liberty to publish those things helpful to the enemy and hurtful to the country, is going to object to a law that says that those who are not willing shall be compelled to do so. I say, with all due deference to you gentlemen who differ with me, that newspapers denouncing this proposed law is the strongest argument that has been offered for its passage, because if they do not intend to publish those things which in the judgment of the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy in a time of war may be hurtful to us, why do they object to this law which merely seeks to prevent its being done? As I said before, we have laws on the statute books against larceny and against murder, and yet nobody has heard honest people complaining that these laws are a reflection on them because these laws say they shall not steal and shall not commit murder. How any newspaper man who is willing to be patriotic and preserve the secrets of his country should object to a law that says if others do not do it they shall be punished is more than I can understand. It is not consistent.

It comes with special bad grace from the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] to talk about the patriotic impulses of the newspaper men, that they ought not to be subject to a law like this because it imputes to them a lack of patriotism, when a week ago he appealed to us to deny to the patriotic American citizens an opportunity to volunteer as soldiers but to take them by conscription. Certainly it is as much a reflection on the manhood of this country to deny them this privilege and to draft them into the Army as it is on the newspapers to say we are going by law to prevent them publishing those things thought to be helpful to our enemies and hurtful to our own country to have published.

Mr. IGOE. Perhaps the press wants to volunteer.

Mr. CARAWAY. They want to volunteer advice, and much of that is often hurtful and untrustworthy. I do not understand the attitude of gentlemen who take the position that we should take from 1,000,000 to 5,000,000 young men by draft—and I am not complaining of that law, for I voted for it—take them by force if necessary and send them out on the firing line to defend our country and then expose them to needless perils by giving advance information as to their number, equipment, and things helpful to their enemy by permitting such things to be published to the world. I say that the newspaper that wants to give that sort of information and objects to a law forbidding it doing so, and threatens to disobey such a law if enacted, is bordering dangerously near to treason. If you are going to compel the young men of this country to offer their lives as a sacrifice and bare their breasts to death in the forefront of battle, if you are going to expose them to all the perils incident to war, why, in the name of God, are you not willing to give to them what protection that may come to them by preventing newspapers or anyone else from advising the enemy and giving him information that will make our boys' position more perilous and our country less safe and secure? [Applause.] How can you reconcile your attitude, gentlemen, in voting to send young men by draft to the front and then, merely because some newspaper published in your district is opposed to being regulated, come here, and by your vote seek to deny those young men that protection that comes by having the secrets of the military department kept from the enemy? Can you afford to do it? Would you be willing that a newspaper should publish anything through which any young man sent by law to the front should lose his life by reason of the information so published? Can you pay that price? We all know who read history at all that the campaigns of the Civil War were destroyed almost in every instance by newspapers.

Newspaper correspondents went with every army, and as a consequence we had political generals and we fought political campaigns, and there are thousands upon thousands of unmarked graves in this country between this city and the capital of the Confederacy that were dug by correspondents' pens. Can you afford to say that because newspapers want to be permitted to demonstrate their patriotism and abuse those who seek to compel a reasonable observance of our country's requirements you are going to let them go without any restriction in order that they, perchance, may speak well of you? The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] insists there is some kind of censorship now, and the only objection he seemed to have to it is that some man named Price has been appointed to a place of power in it. I do not know anything about that. If what I have read of Price be true, I certainly should regret it if he has been appointed on any board of censors; then how much better is it to have a law which defines these things about which regulations may be made, so that everyone may know what is forbidden, than to give to irresponsible persons the power to censor every bit of the news that goes to the people of this country of the armies on the European battle front. I would rather have a responsible head than to have an irresponsible censorship, and if you do not object to regulation you can not afford to vote to strike out section 4. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire now to discuss the merits of the bill, but I do desire to state for the information of the House that I have within less than three minutes talked with Mr. Creel. He advises me that Mr. Price has not been given and will not be given any position in connection with the existing censorship, nor, so far as he knows, touching any other censorship board that may be created. I say that because I think it is due to the House in view of what has been said, in order that a personal equation may not be brought into this discussion.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

Mr. BORLAND—

> How can I speak thee, or thy power express,
> Thou god of our idolatry, the Press?
> A fountain at which drink the good and wise,
> Or an ever-bubbling spring of endless lies;
> Like Eden's dread probationary tree,
> Knowledge of good and evil is of thee.

Our fathers of the Constitution wisely provided for the freedom of the press. Jefferson has said, as the Speaker reminds us, that a government without newspapers is worse than newspapers without government. Yet we must recollect that the clause of the Constitution giving freedom of the press, like all other provisions for liberty in that document, does not mean license. It is coupled in the same clause with the provision for freedom of speech, and if one section of this bill which restricts freedom of speech and communication is in violation of the Constitution the other is. Section 4 can no more infringe upon that provision of the Constitution than the other sections relating to the communication of information injurious to the Government by anyone. I want to say, gentlemen, that in the eight years in which I have served in this House I have had my full share of newspaper criticism. I have never found it necessary in that time to rise to a question of personal privilege, nor to attack nor comment upon the statement of any newspaper in regard to public affairs. I think it is one of the most valuable privileges of the American public life that public men are subject to that criticism, and I would not want to see it taken away.

I realize also very fully that the newspapers in the last few days or in the last few weeks during this emergency have placed upon themselves a most remarkable as well as a most high-minded patriotism in the matter of censorship to which they have voluntarily submitted. I know of many cases—not many, but I know of enough—where facts of great value to the Government have been within the knowledge of the newspaper correspondents, and they knew that they were not to publish them and did not publish them. That is true to-day. I could give an instance to-day within my own knowledge of facts within the knowledge of newspapers which might be injurious if published and which the press has refrained from mentioning. But, as the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], a member of the committee, says, laws are not made for those high-minded men who voluntarily obey the law, and laws are not made for those high-minded and reputable newspapers which voluntarily submit to a censorship. I can not see how that class of newspapers can object to the restraining force of law against a totally different class.

Mr. McCORMICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes, if I have the time. I have not much, but I will be glad to yield.

Mr. McCORMICK. I was going to ask the gentleman if between enumerated subjects the discussion of which may be prohibited and the elimination of all of section 4 the gentleman has any choice if that alternative were presented to him?

Mr. BORLAND. If that alternative were presented, I will say quickly to my friend I would choose the enumeration rather than the elimination of the section, but I do not think the enumeration would be feasible at this time. It seems to me that this provision bears so little disadvantage upon the newspapers, as compared with a real censorship, that it can not be attacked successfully on that ground.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY].

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk be read in my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DEMPSEY: Page 36, lines 1 to 9, inclusive, after the word "war," in line 3, strike out the rest of the line and all of line 4; after the word "which," in line 7, strike out the words "in his judgment"; after the word "enemy," in line 8, insert "is hereby prohibited"; and strike out the first three words in line 9, "any such prohibition," and insert in place thereof "this section."

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, can we have the section reported as it would read if amended as proposed by the gentleman, if that were agreed to?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I only want to speak for a moment, and I am perfectly willing.

The Clerk read as follows:

During any national emergency resulting from a war to which the United States is a party, or from threat of such a war, the publishing or communicating of, or the attempt to publish or communicate, any information relating to the national defense which is of such character that it is or might be useful to the enemy is hereby prohibited. Whoever violates any such prohibition shall be punished by a fine of not more than—

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I do not care to nor shall I attempt to discuss the merits of this section. I did that this morning, so far as I cared to do so. I only want to address myself to the proposition of the amendment. I said this morning, and I repeat now, I believe that I will vote against this section when it comes up; but if it is to prevail, I do not think that the decision whether certain acts constitute a crime should be left to the discretion of any one man. I think what are crimes should be fixed and defined by the proper legislative body, and that whether a crime has been committed should be a matter to be determined in the usual manner and by the usual tribunals. Now, since I spoke this morning, the chairman of the committee has offered an amendment which, I will admit, is more acceptable than the provision in the printed bill.

The amendment provides that the President may by proclamation declare certain things to be prohibited. He shall enumerate, in other words. Now, that is less objectionable, because then the public are advised what are crimes and when they are committing crimes, but I think that is objectionable in this way: It does not allow Congress to define crimes. We are the lawmaking power, and we are giving to the Executive the power to determine, sometimes in advance, that something shall be a crime—some unenumerated, some speculative, some uncertain, some problematical thing—which we can only guess at now. This proposition should stand here fully upon its own basis, and if it is a crime to communicate things which may be of benefit to the enemy that should be prohibited and be prohibited by the lawmaking power. We should not say that at some future time some officer, no matter who he may be, may determine that certain things shall be crimes and those things be punished. The discretion resides with us, and we might not at all agree with this officer, however elevated his position, in what he considers to be a crime. It was well pointed out by the minority leader that the very thing that he might consider to be inadvisable and even criminal we might as a body, in the patriotic exercise of our discretion, believe to be the things which should be encouraged instead of being prohibited. Gentlemen, I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand the amendment which has been offered and reported is pending?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY]?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes; it is at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand it has been reported and is pending, offered as a substitute, I suppose, to the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair did not understand it that way.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK].

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. Speaker, I offer this as a substitute for the pending amendment and ask that it be read in my time. I will only speak for a moment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MCCORMICK: Page 36, section 4, strike out all of line 7 and all of line 8 up to and including the words "to the enemy" and substitute the following: "Movements, numbers, description, or disposition of any armed force, ship, aircraft, or war material of the United States, or with respect to the plans for the conduct of any naval or military operations, or with respect to any work or measures undertaken for or conducted with or intended for the fortification or defense of any place prior to the publication or communication of such facts by the Government directly or by its authority."

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. Speaker, the issue before the House on section 4 apparently will resolve itself into three distinct parts: First, whether the House shall prefer to uphold the principle of the section as originally drawn or the substitute offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB]; or, second, whether, as seems more probable at this juncture, it shall decide to strike out all of section 4; or, third, whether it shall adopt the principle embodied in the amendment which I have offered.

Let me disclaim actual authorship of this amendment. It is based on the amended bill in the Senate, and is the handiwork of others beside myself. The question is whether there shall be no censorship of publication or whether matters which may be published and therefore discussed shall be entirely within the discretion of the Executive, or whether Congress shall try at least to enumerate subjects regarding which publication may be prohibited. And before I conclude I confess frankly that enumeration can not be exact; that if objection were made to this amendment that it did not exactly cover the ground the objection would be sound.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. The gentleman is familiar, I presume, with the fact that in the original bill, introduced in the last Congress, prepared by the department, this section followed the plan suggested by the gentleman of enumerating certain things. So it is really the plan approved by the department, and what is in this bill really never has had the approval of the department.

Mr. McCORMICK. Well, one might say a physician prescribed infinitesimal doses of strychnine, but that the gentleman would have the patient consume a tomato can full of it. There is a difference.

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman's enumeration does not include the sailing of merchant vessels, information concerning which might be very useful to the enemy.

Mr. McCORMICK. Ships, without qualification.

Mr. PLATT. That is so worded that it seems to refer to public ships only.

Mr. McCORMICK. I think not; but I have expressly disclaimed infallibility for the text of this amendment; but if the House were to consider it seriously I should say that Members of more experience than I should essay to make the enumeration more perfect than that which is herein contained.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, lacking one year of a century and a quarter, we are attempting for the first time to amend and extend the neutrality laws that have been declared by eminent writers on international law to be the greatest contribution to public law that the United States has given to the civilized world. The clause under consideration involves, as I consider it, not only the liberty of the press but the liberty of the people.

War has been on, or diplomatic relations have been broken off, for more than a month, and yet we find the press, regardless of the attitude which they took prior to the severance of diplomatic relations, loyally supporting the Government. Papers printed in the German language that prior to the war or the severance of diplomatic relations took decided stand in favor of our keeping out of the foreign embroglio have in editorial expressions since, and many times, stated they intend to give loyal support to the Government.

The objection to this provision does not lie necessarily in the abuse that may result from its enactment. We can agree that in its enforcement it may not be abused, but the objection that I have, and a serious objection, is the fear of the offending that will be created in the minds of all the newspaper publishers of the country that if it is enacted they may incur the displeasure of censors, and, more, be guilty of a crime. That can result only in throttling the freedom of the press, which is essential to the maintenance of our liberty. Before we do that, there should be some showing made on the part of members of the committee that such plenary power is needed. Not an instance has been cited by any member of the committee that calls for an abridgment of the constitutional inhibition inserted shortly after the adoption of the Constitution to make the Constitution secure in the faith of the States which had adopted it; that one thing above all others should not be infringed, and that is the inviolability of the freedom of discussion by the press.

But this law as it is written seeks to apply not only to the present emergency but seeks to extend through all time; and I for one am unwilling to surrender even the amended form, as suggested by the chairman of the committee, to some one who may be such an autocrat as will rule this country with such a power that the people will not know the exact conditions that are existing in time of war. During all our previous wars, in the Civil War when feeling ran high on both sides in the border States, the press was not muzzled by fear of offending any autocratic censor in publishing criticisms on the conduct of the war; and I believe such an enactment now is fraught with danger to the free exercise of our liberty.

Why, if you look at the practical side, you will agree there is no possibility at the present time, under existing discontinuance of wireless communication and the cutting of cables with Germany, that any information inimical to the country's welfare can reach the enemy. Therefore, I submit, what is the need at this time of curbing the freedom of the press, the press of the public and the people, by adopting something that has not been shown as necessary up to the present time.

Mr. PLATT. How does the gentleman know that all the possibilities of communicating by wireless have been shut off?

Mr. STAFFORD. By the reading of the public press immediately following the breaking of diplomatic relations with Germany, when it was acknowledged that Germany was without any information as to the ground upon which the diplomatic relations were broken off for more than two weeks. And I know that, so far as information concerning submarine warfare is concerned, Great Britain is so potential in controlling the news as to submarine warfare that we have been deprived not only of the true facts but the facts have been misrepresented, in order to mislead not only the people of Great Britain but the people of the United States as to the destructive character of the German submarine warfare. This may be justified on the ground that the information may be useful to the enemy, but we want no such policy of restricted and untruthful news.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN].

Mr. SLAYDEN. May I ask the gentleman if I can possibly have 10 minutes?

Mr. GARD. I have no authority other than that delegated to me by the chairman, but I think we can take care of the gentleman.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Very well. Relying on that, I will try to get through in less than 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, it would be audacious in me to undertake the discussion of a constitutional question. I am not a lawyer. I do not view things through a lawyer's eye. But I have repeatedly read the Constitution, and I have recently read and reread the 10 amendments to the Constitution, which say, among other wise things, that Congress shall make no law abridging the right of free speech and the freedom of the press. They do not say that Congress shall make some law or some sort of law, but they say Congress shall make no law abridging the right of free speech and the freedom of the press—no law whatever.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have talked with some of my friends here to-day about this bill, exchanging views, and I have found that some of them who went down with me to defeat last week in the support of the principle of a volunteer army, but who are naturally and instinctively opposed to any such abridgment of the right of free speech and the freedom of the press were yet strongly tempted, so they said, to punish the press because of its inconsistent attitude. You have already had pointed out to you several times by the Speaker and other gentlemen in a forceful way how the press, less than 10 days ago, was raving almost in its demands that the Congress of the United States, no matter what individual Members might think, must abandon its views, abase this body, and abdicate its dignity as a coordinate branch of the Government, and do what it was commanded to do. I felt a little sore myself because of the position of the newspapers, but I can not yield to the temptation to punish anybody if that involves the abandonment of a serious and lifelong conviction, as my belief in the first amendment to the Constitution is, and I think it is, perhaps, the most important of all the sections in that document. The press is right in this demand for unabridged freedom to publish.

If we do abandon free speech, if we do abridge the freedom of the press, we strike at the very fundamentals of free government; and, Mr. Speaker, too many blows have already been aimed in that direction. Let us adopt the policy of universal military service; let us militarize this Government, and then deprive the press of the freedom of publishing its views and reaching the public in that way, and deprive the individual citizen of the right of agitation and the expression of his views, and the way will have been made plain and easy for some despot of the future.

It is too great a danger. We are fixing political policies that will probably endure in our country. We have virtually agreed to a military policy which, I believe, is full of danger, but which I am now convinced will be the policy of the future. I know that it is the project that military men have had in their minds for many years past. I have talked it over with them. I know their view on that question, and while I want to leave to the press all the freedom of publication that is possible, I think its ways should be amended in many particulars.

My friend from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] was telling me this morning of a conversation that he had yesterday with a distinguished editor of an eastern newspaper, who complained bitterly about this bill and denounced it and said it should not pass; that it was a blow at the liberties of the people.

My Kansas friend suggested to him that the press was not fair on this question, as well as on many others, because they gave only one side of a controverted question in Congress; and he asked the editor to compare the conduct of the American papers with those of Great Britain, which in all the heated debates in that country over the question of conscription fairly, and from day to day, presented both sides of it and the arguments made by both the opponents and proponents of the measure. The New York editor—there, unwittingly, I am giving his location, which I did not intend to do, and I will say "the editor of this eastern newspaper"—said, "Yes; the newspapers of the two countries are run on a different policy. Ours are run chiefly for the purpose of propaganda, of promoting some particular object. They are run for the purpose of molding public opinion"—that was his exact phrase—"while the papers of Great Britain undertake to publish the news and give both sides of a controverted question." I hope that some newspapers in this country some time will undertake to give us publications on that model, giving us the news, and telling both sides of questions, and leaving to American citizens the privilege of making up their minds on those questions.

Now, I want to say a word about the censorship. A few days ago I had the pleasure of meeting an official of this Government, an official belonging to one of the military branches, and he was discussing the question of the censorship. He was heartily in favor of it. He had been selected for service in connection with it, representing one branch of the military service. He said, "I think that the model censorship was that conducted by Maj. Blank at Blank during the Spanish-American War. His idea of censorship was to suppress everything, and it was his invariable rule when documents, letters, papers, or anything else came into his hands to pigeonhole everything." He did not censor it. His censorship was not intelligent. He disobeyed the orders that had put him there, because a censorship, as I understand it, involves discretion as to what should not go through, what might give aid and comfort to the enemy, and what is harmless and necessary in the general conduct of business and the spread of information which the people are entitled to. I suggested to him that that man ought to have been court-martialed for disobedience of orders or dismissed from the service for stupidity.

I know of but one case parallel to his. A friend of mine who visited Russia a few years ago told me that when he got to the border books that he had taken along to entertain himself on the road were taken away, and when they were returned after a few days pages here and there were blacked out so that they could not be read.

He had a copy of an illustrated London newspaper, which was taken from him, and when brought back to him the whole of the last page had been blacked out so that it was impossible to decipher a single word. It piqued his curiosity. He fixed in his memory the date of the paper, and when he got back to a free country he bought a copy of that paper and found that the last page was a huge advertisement which said that the Czar of all the Russias used Pears soap. [Laughter.] Now, that is on a par with the intelligence of the censorship that will be conducted in this country.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman yields back a minute and a half of his 10 minutes.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the proceedings which took place in the Chamber to-day when the French commission visited the House may be inserted in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the matter indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] one minute.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, it has been said by many of the gentlemen on the committee that the newspapers in my city, New York, were under a misapprehension, and that they had in mind the original bill. I want to say that all of the papers of New York City, and especially the New York American and Evening Journal, have in the last three days, both editorially and in their news columns, presented fairly and accurately the bill as presented by the committee and now under discussion. The people understand the bill and know of the changes made by the committee. The New York Journal and American, and the papers published by Mr. Hearst throughout the country, have asked for expressions from their readers on the bill, and the response has been that in three days 600,000 citizens have signed a petition protesting against this measure, which I have this day formally presented to this House. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I am not only in favor of striking this section out of the bill but I believe this Government should make a request, if not a demand, upon our allies that the system of censorship now exercised and that has been exercised by them should be removed. If the censorship that has been exercised has worked well in Europe, I am quite sure that it will not work well in the United States. That it has been a failure in Europe was voiced in the House of Commons day before yesterday, when it was said by one high in authority that England had made a great mistake in censoring the press and keeping the facts away from the people, and that in his opinion the people should be taken into the confidence of the Government. I believe that in this country of ours that will be demanded. I believe we should not only know what is going on with reference to our own country, in so far as the facts are concerned in which the public are all alike interested, but that we should also know what is going on over on the other side with reference to the armies of the allies. If that had been the rule, we would not be in the dark to-day as to whether the war in Russia is at an end. If that had been the rule, the conditions would not have prevailed as have been cited, that the Russian soldiers had been battling on their front for a year before they knew that England was even engaged in the war. If that had been the rule, we would not to-day be in the dark with reference to the financial condition of Italy. If that had been the rule, we would not be in the dark to-day with reference to the exact condition prevailing throughout all the countries that are now our allies. We would know whether the submarine is destroying an inconsiderable number of vessels, as was reported some weeks ago, or whether it is destroying vessels in such alarming proportions that the very existence of France and England is threatened and the safety of the United States seriously menaced, as reported to-day.

And there is this thing that we should consider, that the American people are an independent people, boasting of their freedom of speech and freedom of the press since this Government was founded, and they will not easily submit to being kept in the dark. They feel that if they are furnishing the money to carry on this war they are entitled to know something of its conduct; and this law, innocent as it may appear, innocent as it may be intended except as to those who willfully commit crime, as such laws always have been in the past, will be an instrument of tyranny in the hands of tyrants. Gen. Grant in his memoirs says considerable with reference to the trouble that was caused by reason of this character of law from 1861 to 1865. He says that at no time from the beginning of his generalship to the close of that war did he ever issue an order that a single private individual should be imprisoned, yet that a great portion of his time was occupied in releasing men from prison who, it was said, were imprisoned because of his orders, he having given no such orders. That will be the trouble with this law.

Many of you no doubt have read that volume entitled "The American Bastile During the War of the Rebellion." I wish that every Member of this Congress might read of the hardships, the trials, the cruelties innumerable heaped upon private individuals and citizens throughout this country. It is not so much the law as it is the abuse of that law. I believe we have now upon our statute books ample protection against infractions that may be committed by the press of the United States and which should be punished. They are liable to prosecution for treason; they are liable to prosecution in the same manner that a private individual is liable, and it occurs to me that unless what they publish is dangerously near or akin to treason they should have full liberty to exercise their own censorship as to the policy and judgment they employ in giving information to the public. As has been said upon this floor—and it strikes me as being a forceful argument—the American people, who are called upon not only to give of their billions for the prosecution of this war, but who will be called upon to give their millions in men, should know something of what is going on at the front.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I am unalterably opposed to the enactment of any law that will place in the hands of any man, no matter who he may be—President or what he may be—the power to say what constitutes a crime. If this section remains in the bill the President of the United States will have such power. What we need more than anything else is to have all the liberty of criticism that the people of the United States have a right to expect to enjoy, not only by individuals but through the press. What we need is to know every movement of the troops, whether they are being fed properly, whether they are being clothed properly, whether they are being given the accommodations they ought to have in the camp or in the field, and whether the war is being conducted as it should be conducted; whether the men in command are qualified to command, and whether they are conducting their commands with wisdom or with unwisdom. Such information as this ought to be in the possession of the people who fight the war and who pay the bills. But if this section is allowed to remain in the bill no such information will be permitted to be given to the American people.

If we expect the confidence of the people and their enthusiastic support in the conduct of the war, we must take them into the confidence of the Government. They are entitled to know what the Government is doing. The Government is made by the people and for the people. I do not believe it ought to be considered the people are made for the Government; that the Government should be supreme; that no person living in the land has the right to know what the Government is doing. Censorship to the extent provided for in this section of the bill is unjust. It is un-American; it is against freedom; and it is against the liberty for which we are fighting. While we are fighting to establish the democracy of the world, we ought not to do the thing that will establish autocracy in America. [Applause.] I know of nothing that we can do that will come more nearly to establishing an autocracy than the enactment of a law which places it within the power of the President of the United States to say what constitutes a crime.

We are all ready to uphold the hands of the President in his conduct of the war, but we do not want to make the President so far superior to every other ruler on earth that the people of the country over which he rules will be barred from the expression of opinion as to the character of the rule that he gives. [Applause.]

The widest latitude should be given to the press to criticize graft, crooked contracts, extravagance in the conduct of the war, bad management of the Government, excessive expenditures in all lines, and every sort of criticism that will tend to let the administration know that it is not the only thing that lives on the American Continent. [Applause.] We want this war conducted successfully, and I believe it can not be successfully conducted unless the people are given all the information that will lead them to the conclusion that the war is being fought with a singleness of purpose, that purpose being to develop that system of government not only in this country but throughout the world that means rule by the people. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, one of the dangers that faces people in time of war is that under stress of emergency we are apt to do things that will forfeit fundamental principles. We are in danger of sweeping away in an hour's time institutions of a century's building, which cost blood and treasure to establish. That situation is now presented here. One of the fundamental principles of our Government is that organic law which recognizes the absolute freedom of the press as well as of speech, to secure which I think the most heated debate in the Constitutional Convention, known as the Federal Convention, was conducted. At the very outset of our nationality this was the prime object of our aspiration as a Nation.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. MORGAN. I would like for the gentleman to define what the freedom of the press is under the Constitution, because it all hangs on that. Does that mean that there can be no restriction or limitation?

Mr. FESS. In freedom of the press I do not mean what might be called the license to do anything you please without regard to the effect of it. That feature is not involved here. What I mean is that the individual who wants to say something, or the editor who wants to write, can exercise the freedom to give what is in his mind with the understanding that he will have to meet whatever punishment will come through his having violated any right the violation of which might be regarded as an injury to the public. Here the remedy is in prosecution and not in injunction. We now have our remedy against improper publication, but that is far from muzzling free speech. What I am concerned about is that we ought not to pass a law fixing a penalty for its violation without first deciding what the law is. We propose here to attach a heavy penalty for violation of a law which is not yet defined. We here propose to give to an individual the power to say what the thing is to which that penalty must be applied. We certainly can not do that. There is no crime outside of statutory enactment, and to delegate its designation otherwise is extraconstitutional. When I argue for the freedom of the press I do it not for the sake of the publishers; they may not deserve it. I am not speaking from the standpoint of the editor. If I were to follow sentiment instead of judgment I would most likely put on the muzzle, in view of the recent intolerance of the press on behalf of an inhuman philosophy. I care nothing about that. I am speaking from the standpoint of the welfare of the country, upon the effect of abridging the freedom of the press, and its ultimate effect upon public opinion. I think to bridle the press in order to keep from the public facts that some one thinks ought not to be made public would be a remedy that is vastly worse than the disease that you are trying to cure. It is not too much information that hurts; it is the misinformation of a censored press that the country must avoid. What the country has the right to know is the true situation. There is no comment upon this need more powerful than that of Lord Beresford recently on the submarine situation. It is not the real situation England and America suffer from but the lack of true information touching the submarine that makes it a sensitive question both for England and America. We have the right to know the facts, and if you will prevent it through authority given to somebody to say that at this time my judgment suggests that it ought not to be uttered, it will be a dangerous step, because that judgment may be changed to-morrow and be different to-day from what it was yesterday. [Applause.] Judgment too frequently is shaped in the current of events, which is constantly changing.

There is nothing so fallible as individual judgment, and it seems to me that what we ought to guard against is writing a law in a time of war that will be in total contravention to the very principle for which the Nation struggled long and hard, and which was set out as the very first and foremost of all the famous code of human rights under government. The freedom of speech and of the press stands as the real palladium of our liberties, and it was written in the organic law as fundamental. It is the first amendment to the Federal Constitution.

If I had time it would be a delight to indicate the struggle in the constitutional convention between two schools of political thought. One school was led by Thomas Jefferson, although not in the convention, but through the man who represented him, Mr. Madison. He was the country's greatest exponent of liberty in government; hence his insistence upon a bill of rights as a part of the Constitution. The question came up whether this bill of rights demanded by the Jeffersonian school should be made a part of the Constitution or omitted entirely. There were those who contended that these rights should be written in the Constitution as a part of the instrument proper. Then another school insisted such a pronouncement had no place in a democracy or republic. Mr. Hamilton said there is no such thing as a bill of rights in a republic, because a bill of rights presupposes a king, the possessor of sovereign rights, giving rights to the people, and such rights as the people would not have unless the king gave them to the people. But in this country, he contended, the people are the sovereign power; and the bill of rights would be the people giving rights to the people, or the sovereign power conferring upon themselves rights which they already had, which would be inconsistent in a government by the people or in a republican form of government.

This debate ran for several days. However, the contention was not whether the people should possess the rights afterwards written in the Bill of Rights, but simply whether these rights should be designated in the organic law to insure their enjoyment by the people. The Jeffersonians demanded them written in the covenant. The Hamiltonians resisted it as unnecessary. At last a compromise was reached. They agreed to omit the bill of rights as a part of the original instrument proper or as a fundamental part of the Constitution, but they made it specific that the States, upon their ratification, should suggest in the form of amendments what these rights should be. Almost every State made suggestions. The sum total covered all the suggested rights. Consequently, the States recommended many amendments which were classified by the first session of Congress in 1791.

As I now recall the historical facts, these amendments were classified under 12 heads by the First Congress and submitted, as any other amendment is submitted, to the people for ratification. Of the 12 thus voted on 10 were ratified, and thus became a part of the fundamental law of the land in 1791. Amongst those are the ones relating to freedom of speech and of the press and the right to worship God and the right to assemble and petition the Government. This inhibition of Congress to abridge the freedom of the press is not the very first by accident. It was even then regarded as of the highest importance. There were nine others that followed, every one to secure to the individual the right, without which it could not be secured, according to the Jeffersonian school of thought. Those 10 amendments, though not in the Constitution, are just as fundamentally a part of the Constitution as if they had been written in the fundamental law. I do not want in the heat of the excitement of war to wipe out to-day a right that has never been questioned but once in a serious vein of mind. In fact, I do not want to vote for any law that will abridge any of these rights. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, it will not be out of place in this discussion to refresh our minds of one prior attempt to abridge the freedom of speech and the press. It was back in the Federalist régime, when the sedition law was enacted back in 1798.

Under that law several persons were prosecuted; the most famous cases were Matthew Lyon and Thomas Cooper. Also four editors of four important papers were prosecuted—the Aurora, of Philadelphia; the Argus, of New York; the Chronicle, of Boston; and the Examiner, of Richmond.

The revulsion against this violation of the first amendment produced the famous Kentucky resolutions, written by Jefferson, and the Virginia resolutions, by Madison.

It also led to the defeat of the Federalist Party by the Democrat or Jeffersonian school, which held absolute sway for 50 years, save two interregnums of 4 years each.

There is no passion in our nationality stronger than that which demands an untrammeled press and free speech.

Mr. Speaker, there is not a Member here who does not wish to give unstinted support to the Commander in Chief in time of war. This must not demand of us that we repudiate our most sacred fundamentals of democracy.

This is especially true in a country that is governed by public opinion. There is nothing sounder than a public opinion based upon facts, undisputed detail of the real situation. There is nothing more dangerous among us than a prejudiced public opinion, based upon ignorance of realities. What America demands and what we have a right to have is the real situation in this war.

The suspicion, strongly supported by continued reversals of accounts on the European fronts and the submarine danger, arouses resentment in the American mind. This country will demand the truth, no matter whether favorable or otherwise, in order that it may provide for the worst. It demands to know the Russian situation, that it need not grope in the dark. If the censor becomes active in expurgation to withold the facts and it becomes known to our people, the problem will be vastly different from Europe. I shall therefore vote against this proposed bridling of the news in the conviction that it is not knowledge but the lack of it that will insure disaster.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COMSTOCK].

Mr. COMSTOCK. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I shall not take advantage of the opportunity I have to occupy even the five minutes of time allotted. I have not the vanity to believe that I will be able to say anything that has not already been better said upon either side of the question we are considering. I am not surprised that a painstaking and conscientious Committee on the Judiciary were perplexed and labored hard to agree on the bill which they now present. Upon the motion now pending I have had some doubt. As I understand the question, it is upon the motion to strike out the fourth section of Title I. I do not propose—and, in fact, it is unnecessary upon my part—to enlarge upon the general provisions of the bill; but I am clear upon this proposition, though I do not care, as I have in effect said, to use the time to give the processes by which I reached the conclusion, and will simply state the conclusion; and, if I later see fit to extend my remarks, I hope to have the ordinary indulgence accorded to Members of the House to do so. Upon the question of the constitutionality of two provisions in this section I now have no doubt. I think that the section gives to the Chief Executive the power of legislation. That power can not be delegated by Congress. I think there can be but one interpretation or one construction of the section. It permits him to determine what is a violation of the law and when that violation shall be punished.

As to the other provision referred to, it abridges the freedom of the press—a right that has engaged the attention of statesmen for many years and up to this time held inviolable. I think there can be no question about that. I do not mean by the expression "freedom of speech" to be understood as meaning unbridled license. I think there should always go along with its interpretation the spirit of the act, that there should be a certain decency and propriety in whatever may be written or spoken. In the laws of all of our States damages are awarded on account of any wrong occasioned by untruthful defamation either by a newspaper in a written article or by an individual in spoken words. We recognize that the same principle might by proper legislation be applied to the General Government, that it might have a right to shield itself from attack that might lend aid and comfort to the enemy. The basic principle of the question presented is that it involves the invasion of a right which has been regarded ever since the Government was founded as a sacred right, the freedom of the press—not unbridled license but the right to do certain things that are regarded as legitimate and honest and proper as matters of information to give to the people. I shall not discuss the matter, but simply express myself as favoring the motion to strike out this fourth section of Title I. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I now yield the remaining portion of my time, if I may be permitted to do so, to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has one minute remaining.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. Speaker, our forefathers came to this country to escape religious tyranny. They came here to enjoy free speech, they came to worship God as they chose, to carve out for themselves a future, and to conquer a wilderness. God was their common master and each was the equal of his brother.

> What constitutes a State?
> Not high-raised battlements or labored mound,
> Thick wall or moated gate;
> Not broad-armed ports, where, laughing at the storm, > rich navies ride.
> No; men, high-minded men—
> Men who their duties know;
> But know their rights, and knowing, dare maintain:
> These constitute a State.

These must be the men who, intrusted with a nation's heritage, will defend our constitutional rights as well as our international ones. Our Nation's defense lies in its people's devotion to its free institutions, free speech, an unbridled press, free worship, and our public schools, from whose towers for 140 years the Stars and Stripes tell in what a spirit are reared our coming men. [Applause.]

This question involves a principle deeper than the interest of this or that big newspaper. It digs to the root of every individual's right. Neither Congress nor the President has the right to deny or abridge the freedom of the press or the freedom of speech. We can not lightly lay aside constitutional limitations if we are to keep faith with ourselves and the charter of our liberties.

A law which seeks to Russianize our land can not compensate in its temporary good effects for the lasting evil in its train. Too much has our Nation been kept in ignorance. The very spies within our borders, the potentates abroad, know more about our defenses, our plans, our weaknesses than the people of these United States know. Give our people the truth. Give them facts on which to base their conclusions and the idealism and judgment of our Nation can be relied on to make right decisions.

Military information, facts of importance, whose publication might advantage the enemy, these can be kept out of circulation without the passage of so drastic a regulation. The laws of silence in the brotherhood of the press, when invoked by necessity, are as the laws of the Medes and Persians. When patriotism is the motive for silence, surely no man believes that an instinct for scoops, a habit of purveying to the curious, could prevail over the humblest scribe.

In a war that is so widely proclaimed to be a war for democracy it would be a bad precedent to yield this dearly bought heritage. It is not in the genius of the American people to swallow statements because they are "official," to blindly make supreme sacrifices because some one tells them to. But if in the conduct of this war they are kept informed of its progress, its failures as well as its successes, its reverses as well as its advances, its efficient as well as its inefficient servants; if the pitiless light of publicity can seek out the wrongdoer, the speculator, the human vulture who seeks to coin the tragedy of the human race by cheating and sharp practice, then they will press forward without need of spur. In their own breasts will they feel confidence toward the leaders charged with the conduct of the war.

America is not made of the stuff that has to be coddled along with tales of winning to make her fight. Winning or losing, she will fight just the same. Only let her know. Tell her the truth.

Free speech, free press, these are privileges too dear to be abandoned. The intelligence of the plain people of this country has always been reckoned with as a cooperating force in our Government. Why should we set ourselves up to throw away the policies of Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln, of all our forebears, and initiate a system of treating the people as if they were children who could not be trusted, whose counsel and opinion no longer weigh aught in the seat of government? Freedom to criticize is the strongest corrective force in this country. When you destroy public opinion you shut the doors and windows and pull down the shades in our domestic temple and the free light and air of liberty no longer circulate.

I am therefore opposed to the fourth section of this bill, which attempts to amend the Constitution and take the right from the people of free press, free speech, free worship, and I shall therefore cast my vote to strike out this section. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROSE].

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, after reading and considering section 4 of this bill I made up my mind that I could not vote for such a section containing such drastic provisions. I take it that in the provisions of section 4 there are greater possibilities of injury to a certain class of people in the United States than any other legislation brought before the House at this session. It gives the right to the President of the United States, upon the publication by any person of anything which, in his judgment, would be useful to the enemy, to punish such person by a fine of $10,000 and imprisonment. With respect to the provisions of this section, to prevent its passage in its present form, I offered an amendment; but I have learned since then that there have been amendments offered to cover the provisions which struck me as decidedly unfair. This section presumes disloyalty upon the part of the public press. In my judgment that is entirely unwarranted. There has not been a single instance brought to our attention in the discussion of this bill that would lead any of us to believe that the press of this country has done anything less than it should do in order to help this Government in its great time of need. What has been done during this past week—our reception to the great commissions of England and France—is a clear indication of the loyalty and patriotism of all of our people, and I submit that no one class of persons has done more to make the people of our Nation acquainted with the true conditions than the press of the country. I feel now that the time has come for us to assert our rights and not give any one man the right to say what ought to be a crime. There is not a section in this bill, save this one, which does not define the crime to be punished. In this the door is left wide open to one man, or a subordinate appointed by him, who has the right of determining whether or not the publication of anything is a crime, and even all the amendments which have been offered are not satisfactory, I believe now, to the Members of this House; and, therefore, I say, in all justice to ourselves and to the press of this country, that the only safety we have is to eliminate this section, and hence it is with great pleasure that I shall cast my vote in support of the proposition offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. [Applause.] Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, it seems a little remarkable to me that in one breath certain gentlemen in this House will denounce newspapers vigorously as having brought on this war, and even declare that the newspaper men ought to be put in the front rank, as if they were responsible for the war, and then in the next breath the same gentlemen get up here and defend the members of the press and say we must not pass any item in this bill that will hinder for a moment their publishing any facts or any alleged facts they want, and, goodness knows, many of them have at times published alleged facts. It seems to me there is a certain amount of inconsistency in that kind of talk. Personally I do not think, as a newspaper man, there is any serious objection to this section as proposed to be amended by the proposal of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], though I may vote for further amendment.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for a correction?

Mr. PLATT. In just a moment. It seems to me that if the President is required in the case of war to proclaim that a certain class of facts shall not be published without authority—for instance, we will say, facts relating to the Army, or something like that—the very fact that he has included that class of facts as not to be published without authority the newspapers can discuss under the authority of the proviso in this amendment. They can say that facts are being withheld in regard to this matter and that there must be something wrong or they would not be withheld. And they can get up such a hullabaloo about it that if there is anything in it the President will be compelled to modify his decree. I think the press has power enough to see that there will be no such serious abuse of the exercise of such Executive authority as given in this section.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. While I do not sympathize with the statement that newspaper people ought to be put in the front rank, however I do sympathize with the statement that it is not the newspapers we are defending but the country we are defending in having what the newspapers can give them.

Mr. PLATT. Some of the Members of this House apparently think the newspapers ought to have been prevented from publishing any facts concerning American ships being sunk on the ocean. They think that the publication of those facts aroused public opinion and got the people in a frame of mind to resent the outrages that were put upon us. And they blame the newspapers for that. And then they turn around and want to defend the papers and say they should print any facts they want to. How they can reconcile both attitudes I do not understand.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think there is quite a distinction between criticizing the newspapers for a policy which they advocate and permitting them to publish any information?

Mr. PLATT. As nearly as I understand the attitude of some of the gentlemen here, they objected to the publishing of certain information in the newspapers.

Mr. MANN. I have heard of no such statement in the House during my service in the House. I have heard gentlemen criticize the policy of the newspapers in advocating certain policies to be followed by the Government. It seems there is quite a difference between criticizing a paper for its policy and for publishing information.

Mr. PLATT. I think that is true.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is advocating a provision now under which, if it had been followed, the President could have forbade the newspapers publishing any information concerning the sinking of American vessels, because there was war threatened at that time.

Mr. PLATT. I suppose he might possibly have done that, but the newspapers could turn right around and criticize that very fact. They could say that American ships were being sunk.

Mr. MANN. No; they could not.

Mr. PLATT. And that the President was suppressing that fact.

Mr. MANN. If they did, they could have been sent to the pen for it.

Mr. PLATT. I do not believe they could under this section, unless they gave some details as to the sinking that they got hold of in some way without authority. I think because of the fact that they were being prevented from publishing they could criticize.

Mr. MANN. They could be criticized for publishing details as to the sinking of vessels, but not the facts as to the vessels being sunk. It would be no actual information. It would be innuendo.

Mr. PLATT. The criticism would accomplish what they were after.

Mr. MANN. It certainly might.

Mr. PLATT. I think there is another thing to be said. I believe some such section as this proposed to be amended by the gentleman from North Carolina would, to a certain extent, protect the smaller newspapers of the country, which do not have correspondents and do not have yachts scouring around the ocean looking for news, but must get their information from the news agencies.

Mr. WEBB. It would protect the honest newspapers.

Mr. PLATT. It would protect the honest newspapers and the smaller newspapers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns this afternoon it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ESPIONAGE.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT].

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Speaker, during the course of this debate I heard the amiable Speaker of the House say that he agreed with Thomas Jefferson in proclaiming that he would rather live in a country where there was no government and where there were newspapers than to live in a country where there was a government without newspapers. Of course no one would assume to contradict or refute any such assertion as that, particularly when it was enunciated by Thomas Jefferson and supported by so eminent an authority as the Speaker of the House. But the question still remains: When you have both a Government and newspapers, then what is the best thing to be done under the circumstances?

The proposition presented to this House in all this argument has been whether or not this measure is constitutional, and the questions have arisen on two theories. First, some gentlemen say that it is not constitutional, because it delegates power to the President which ought to rest affirmatively with the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States. For myself, I confute and refute that proposition. The authorities in the United States reports are full of support of the contention that the legislative authorities, so far as the administrative functions are concerned, can be and have been delegated to the administrative authority. The Interstate Commerce Commission makes rules for railroads. The legislative power was granted by the House and the Senate, and yet we all know, without fear of contradiction, that the rules that are made by the Interstate Commerce Commission, so far as the administrative functions are concerned, are themselves law and can not be disputed.

The next contention is that this is not constitutional because it infringes upon the liberty and the freedom of the press. Now, basically we should determine, first, what is liberty of the press. Do we mean that where there is a government and where there is a press that then the press, by reason of the words in the Constitution to the effect that there shall be no abridgment of that liberty, shall have the right to say and declare what it pleases, and when it pleases, and under all circumstances? If that be liberty of the press, then all authority over the press is nowhere and can rest nowhere,

But this bill declares that in cases of emergency, when the President of the United States shall declare that emergency by a proclamation to exist, then certain things shall be, as a matter of course, established, namely, that information which may be useful to the enemy shall be prohibited from being given, either by word of mouth by the individual or by the press itself.

Now, speaking to the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], who is the chairman of this great committee, what does it declare? It declares that during a war in which the United States is engaged, or during a national emergency threatening war, the President is authorized from time to time to designate by proclamation the character of information concerning the national defense which in his opinion would be useful to the enemy, and that then and thereupon, after such proclamation of what he deems to be necessary in the way of prohibition, it shall be unlawful for any person to publish or communicate such information.

Now, I ask the gentlemen who have been demanding the striking out of this fourth section what reasonable or just excuse——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. DEWALT. I ask for one minute more.

Mr. WEBB. I yield to the gentleman one minute more, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for one minute more.

Mr. DEWALT. I ask what reasonable or just demand could be made by a free and patriotic press, upon the people of this country, to say that after they had been given due notice, and when the President, acting for the defense of the whole Nation, by reason of his authority as President, proclaims that certain things shall not be published when they, in defiance of such proclamation, say they will publish such information, I ask, Where is the justice in such a demand?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The objection I have is that the President may make a proclamation defining a crime and providing a punishment. I do not believe that the Congress can delegate such power. Does the gentleman?

Mr. DEWALT. That is just where the gentleman, in my judgment, is incorrect as a basic proposition. If he will examine the authorities all the way before the Milligan case and subsequent to the Milligan case, he will find that, after all, the legislative power has always been recognized to define in terms what a crime shall be, and then the regulations by which the punishment of that crime is to be enforced and the crime prohibited could be given to the executive authority. My contention as a lawyer is that this bill does nothing more than that. It legislates, prescribing what the crime shall be, and gives to the Executive the power of enforcement and punishment and prohibition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. DEWALT. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Dakota is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of giving the President and the administration every reasonable support that this Congress can give to carry this war to an early and successful conclusion.

We have been asked during the past few days to give to the President and the administrative officers autocratic powers that we would not have countenanced a few months ago giving to any man or to any few men. We are going to be asked in a few days to give to the heads of departments further autocratic powers. We are going to be asked to give to certain administration officers the right to set maximum and minimum prices on all food products and the right to conscript property, and I rather think that, to a large degree, that may be for the best interest of our people in the war. But I hold that the American people should reserve to themselves the right of free speech and the right of a free press. The right of free speech in matters pertaining to the conduct of the present war should not be delegated to the President. To do this would, in my judgment, be vital to the most sacred principles on which this Nation was founded.

In this section the administration asks for the power to be given to the President to say what the newspaper shall or shall not publish, so far as question of facts pertaining to the national defense are concerned. It is true the proviso here recites that—

> Nothing in this section shall be construed to limit or restrict any discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives or the publication of the same.

But about the only thing that can be done under that language is to criticize the action of the administration without giving any facts on which the criticism may be based. If this section is put into effect, it will give the President practically the power to say to the press of the country just what the press shall publish. To-day there is a general opinion over the country that the people are not getting from the newspapers the true facts concerning the European war, that they are getting only the English-French favorable side of it; and I want to say that from what I have personally heard from some of the commissioners from France and from England during the past three days, I am led to believe that the people generally of our country do not truly understand and are not really being given to understand the seriousness of the present war. This war is not going to end in 30 or 60 days or in 6 months, as many of our people have been led to believe. The Imperial German Government is not going to be frightened into peace terms by our declaration of war against it. This must be hard fought to the end, and the indications are, as one of the leading commissioners said, that the war is more likely to last several years longer than to last but one year longer.

There is no occasion nor need at this time for passing any legislation that will put into the hands of the President or into the hands of administrative officers the power to keep from the people the fullest information pertaining to the war and its conduct and progress. I believe that this section should be treated in the same way as the audacious request—that is the only proper term I can think of to characterize it—that was sent to this House by the Secretary of War in asking this Congress to appropriate $3,000,000,000 and turn it over carte blanche to the War Department. That request did not receive a single solitary vote in this House last week, and I believe the request for legislation of this character should not receive a single solitary vote. If the section is going to be passed in any form, it should be passed in a form that will specify the character of information and communications that are to be prohibited. It should under no circumstances be passed in its present un-American form. As it stands, it states that it shall be unlawful to publish or communicate—communicate from person to person—any information relating to the national defense which, in the judgment of the President, is of such a character that it is or might be useful to the enemy. If the section is passed in its present form, it will not be the President's judgment that will be exercised. It will be the judgment of some petty administrative officers. Administrative officers might hold that information regarding the treatment that soldiers were receiving in the Army, information regarding the condition of clothing and food furnished to the soldiers, would be useful to the enemy, and that the publishing of that information would be prohibited. I trust that this section will not receive a single vote. It is not worthy of the vote of any thoughtful self-respecting citizen in this House. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGEE].

Mr. MAGEE. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania to strike section 4 from the bill. I think that this section is within constitutional limitations, but any attempt at any time to restrict in any degree the freedom of speech or of the press is of such great importance that legislation to such end should receive the most careful consideration. If such need shall be deemed to exist, proposed legislation in relation thereto ought to be considered, in my judgment, in a separate bill. I do not think that it is practicable to so amend this section in the limited time for consideration here as to safeguard properly the rights of those who would be affected by such an enactment. Any act providing for severe punishment by fine or imprisonment should contain in clear and concise language what is prohibited by the act and the violation of which or any part thereof will be a crime. What is to be prohibited should be determined by the Congress, and there should be no judgment in the premises except its judgment. [Applause.]

I appreciate that it will be a most difficult matter to state in the body of an act of this character all of the things which shall not be done, but those who may be affected by such an enactment are entitled to know what the law is and what will constitute a violation of the law, and the difficulty, however great, in framing such a law affords no excuse to the lawmaking body. If we are to legislate upon this most important subject, we are bound, in my judgment, to state without ambiguity and affirmatively in the act what will constitute a crime. [Applause.]

I yield back the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman yields back three minutes.

Mr. AUSTIN. May I ask the gentleman a question before he surrenders the floor?

Mr. MAGEE. Yes.

Mr. AUSTIN. Has the gentleman read in the New York daily papers an address delivered in that city last night by Mr. Pomeroy Burton, the manager of the London Daily Mail, in which he warns the American people not to make the mistake the English Government made in passing a bill of this character?

Mr. MAGEE. I have not read that.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for the McCormick amendment, because, in my judgment, the restrictions, even though in a constitutional sense only advisory, should be clearly set forth in the law enacted by the Congress. The Congress constitutes the legislative body, and the executive department ought not to be permitted to make either laws or regulations equivalent to laws when the violation of any such mere regulation is to send a man to the penitentiary.

We have been taught that this is a Government of the people, by the people, for the people, and yet, although the proposition here is to give to one man the right in effect to make a law that, if violated, will throw another into prison, gentlemen say, "Pass it, pass it, as a matter of course." Though some gentlemen seem not to appreciate it, that, Mr. Speaker, is a most serious proposition. In some respects, perhaps in vital respects, this section is, in its possible ultimate consequences, as important to this Republic as was the resolution to declare war itself. This is true because in plain violation of the first amendment to the Constitution, which commands that Congress pass no law abridging the freedom of the press. This section 4 would empower the President to prohibit the publishing or communicating of, or the attempting to publish or communicate, any information relating to the national defense, which, in his judgment, is of such character that it is, or might be, useful to the enemy.

Now, suppose that a man is arrested and haled to the bar of a United States court. The Government proves the publication. What has he published? Simply that the known sanitary conditions of a camp of United States troops, say, at Chickamauga, or elsewhere, are intolerable, as was sometimes the case during our other wars, and that, as a result, the whole force is demoralized. Every voter in the United States ought to know that; but suppose that the President had prohibited the publication of any information relating to the sanitary conditions of troops on the theory that it might be useful to the enemy. The defendant has published it in the utmost good faith, with a view only to helping his country. And yet he has no defense. It is impossible for him to make a defense. For though he be absolutely innocent of wrongful intent the mere fact of the publication convicts him. Though the publication was of matters of public concern and was made from motives purely patriotic, he is denied any opportunity to be judged by the opinion of a jury as to the criminality of his act. The mere violation of the regulation may send him to a prison cell, though the publication was intended only to serve, and would serve, the best interests of the Nation.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I can not yield, as I have only five minutes.

Mr. COX. I am with the gentleman——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I know the gentleman is a man of sound judgment, and I assumed that he was right on this important question.

Mr. Speaker, I wish, as does the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON] to help in every honorable way to sustain the Government in carrying on this war.

We can not be too often reminded that in all popular governments a free press is of vital importance. This truth is forcefully stated by one of the very greatest of American jurists, Justice Thomas M. Cooley, in his Constitutional Limitations, in which, referring to the first amendment to the Federal Constitution, he says:

> The first amendment to the Constitution of the United States provides, among other things, that Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press. The privilege which is thus protected against unfriendly legislation in Congress is almost universally regarded not only as highly important but as being essential to the very existence and perpetuity of free government.

Mark that language—"essential to the very existence and perpetuity of free government." What could more powerfully bring home to us the importance of the bill we are now considering?

"Congress," says the Constitution, "shall pass no law abridging the freedom of the press," and yet it is here proposed to turn over to the executive department—a department created by the Constitution not to make laws but only to execute them—the power to make regulations the violation of which, even with the most innocent of intentions, may send a man to the penitentiary.

Mr. Speaker, I am clearly of the opinion that Congress is wholly without authority, in view of the first amendment to the Constitution, to turn over to one man the power to make such regulations as are suggested in section 4. I can not understand where there is any opportunity for argument about this. There is nothing ambiguous in the language of the first amendment—nothing calling for interpretation except as the language was long ago interpreted and its meaning established. It is clear, explicit, and, what is equally important, it is mandatory. The words are "shall" and "no"—"shall make no laws abridging the freedom of the press." "The constitutional liberty of speech and of the press, as we understand it," says Justice Cooley, "implies a right freely to utter and publish whatever the citizen may please, and to be protected against any responsibility for so doing, except so far as such publications, from their blasphemy, obscenity, or scandalous character, may be a public offense, or as by their falsehood and malice they may injuriously affect the standing, reputation, or pecuniary interests of individuals. Or, to state the same thing in different words, * * * liberty of the press implies not only liberty to publish, but complete immunity from legal punishment for the publication, so long as it is not harmful in its character, when tested by such standards as the law affords. For these standards we must look to the common-law rules which were in force when the constitutional guaranties were established, and in reference to which they have been adopted."

The gentleman from New York, in defending section 4, called attention to the fact that we delegate to the Interstate Commerce Commission the authority to make rules concerning rates. But there is no constitutional provision touching that subject analogous or similar to the prohibition in the first amendment. In one case there is a violation of an express command of the Constitution; in the other there is no constitutional inhibition. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I did not come here with the intention of making any address. If I could explain my vote when I came to cast it I would not stand here, but I can not, and therefore I must give some reason for my judgment. I have been an owner of a newspaper, assisted in founding another, owned and published the paper that Horace Greeley first learned to set type on. But brushing aside all the desires and wishes of editors, I have been a disciple of Blackstone, and practicing all the law that my clients would allow me to. [Laughter.] And I have a fair knowledge, or ought to have, of the English language.

I read the first amendment of the ten which were passed on the 25th of September, 1789. There were 10 of them. I might say that these 10 amendments are 10 commandments, for in each one is wrapped up the essence of "thou shalt not." In this first one it relates to three subjects. What are those subjects? They are religion, speech, and the press. Congress shall make no law respecting the establishment of religion or abridging the freedom of speech and the press. Brush aside the technicalities of your attorneys, for every law library is filled with the bound volumes of their mistakes. One side must lose and the other side must win—about 50-50—and bring to bear on the interpretation of that section your common-school education and it is as plain as can be. I therefore believe in the prohibition of the words "thou shalt not pass"—not that you may pass something, inject a little something, but thou shalt not do it.

Therefore I can not bring my mind to believe that I am observing the oath of office which I took when I came into this Hall, that I would observe the Constitution of the United States, if I vote to retain this section 4. We are attempting to put a great class of patriotic citizens under the ban of being possible criminals. I do not believe that it is necessary to center in the mind of one man or to center in one man's judgment, or to leave to a changing judgment the right to enact criminal statutes. That is what this bill proposes. I know that it is a time for sanity of thought, sanity of speech, and sanity of act, and I hope that my speech and my thought and my act in my vote will encompass a fair degree of that sanity. I am opposed to this section and shall vote against it, or in favor of its amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I frankly confess that for some days after I began the study of this bill I was in some doubt as to whether or not I should vote for this fourth section. However, after I had indulged in a somewhat mature investigation and thought upon the matter, all doubt was removed. I believe it will be exceedingly dangerous for the people of this country if we pass a law of this kind. In the first place, my friends, a democracy lives only because there is such a thing as public sentiment. The moment there is no longer a public policy or public sentiment tyranny is born and democracy dies. I do not believe there can be an efficient government in a democracy such as ours unless there is full publicity on all things that are material and valuable for the people to know. I believe, I think, as strongly as any Member of this House in scientific organization for military efficiency. I believe in every individual subordinating his own desire, his own right, that he can easily relinquish, in order to accomplish the maximum of material efficiency; but I do not believe a democracy can ever be efficient in time of peace when knowledge is denied a hearing and when ignorance prevails, I do not believe that democracy can ever be efficient in war when knowledge is denied the hearing and when ignorance prevails. That which makes a citizen soldier of a Republic the grandest hero and the strongest fighting man of all time is because he is intelligent, because he has back of his arms the strength of a free man, and no one can be a free man with a free man's spirit who is kept in ignorance regarding the purposes and events of the war. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN], by the interrogatories which he made a few moments ago, barely suggested a thought which it would be well for the membership of the House to know. I wish I had time to read the article to which he alluded. It is by a very distinguished gentleman from England now in this country. I do want to read to you two or three paragraphs. He says:

> It must be admitted that the main reason for the utter inability of the people of this country to grasp the true significance of the war to-day is the policy of suppression which has prevailed in the principal entente countries since the day the first shot was fired.
> This close censorship policy has cost them dearly.
> It has kept the spirit and meaning of the war from entering the minds of the people in this and other countries remote from the conflict.
> It has been a brake pressed hard on the wheels, while the hauling was all uphill.

If that is true in England, in France, aye, even in Russia, how much more true would it be in the United States of to-day? We had an example of the high position the public press of this country can be expected to take in a matter of this kind. We had a little war on our hands a year ago now. We sent into the heart of Mexico the flower of our Regular Army, and it was a very considerable expedition. All along the border, eighteen hundred miles in length, there was danger of insurrection and raiding. The public press of this country, in not a single instance, ever published a fact of the slightest value to the enemy, but they kept the American people fairly well advised of the purpose of the pursuit; and now in this time, when great things are at hand, let us put in the public press and the patriotism of the editors of this land that same trust that some one proposes we now place in the hands of the President of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER]. [Applause.]

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, this has been a very refreshing day to me, for I have insisted for some time that as yet the Constitution was a national covenant, and that it was written for the purpose of protecting free men. I am rather glad that this section was put into the bill. It is bringing out an expression from certain gentlemen as to the rights of free men. It will be of value later. Anyone would imagine from what has been going on here to-day that this section will be stricken out. I thoroughly sympathize with the committee. They placed this section in the bill because of their desire to go just as far as they felt they could in what is practically new legislation. Very few Members of this House have ever been called upon to sit in a war Congress. Much of the legislation that is now being proposed is new to us all, and the committee did the right thing in having this question raised. It is doing the fair thing now in giving opportunity to have a thorough discussion. I believe that when the vote is taken we will be satisfied that even during a war period some of the liberties of American citizens are yet to be safeguarded by the American Congress. That will be a mighty good thing. We are all the time tempted, in our desire to do some certain thing, to take a legislative short cut. That is the danger here. In our effort to get control of an obstreperous editor we are going to destroy one of the very fundamental principles of our Government. We have got to watch that all the time in this emergency legislation. In our haste and eagerness to turn everything over to those who are in authority we must not destroy something that we will regret we ever let go. So far as the press itself is concerned, there is not a man in public life who has not seen the time when he would like to get hold of some brash editor and settle the account outside the office. [Laughter.]

I have had three newspaper lies written about me in one newspaper, and then an editorial was written on the lies. I insist that that editor shall be permitted to go on, for his opposition is my biggest boost. We have got to consider this one thing: The newspapers, after all, when you get down to brass tacks, are our only sources of world information. Some one has well said, "A little learning is a dangerous thing." So far as the situation here and abroad is concerned, the newspapers have not been permitted to publish enough of the facts about this war. I find in my district, from the correspondence that is coming in, that many of the protests from my constituents are due to the fact that they do not know the facts about the war. When they are informed by private correspondence they are coming in, steadily, changing their opposition and their attitude toward this whole program. I think that the danger all the time is going to be that our newspapers will not be crowded with real war news to the people. If we could get rid of the editorial page and turn that over to news, it might be desirable. It would give additional news space for the people.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Minnesota if he has any other gentleman who desires to use time? I understand he has 30 minutes remaining of his time.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I would like to suggest that at this time we adjourn. I have some time left, but I would like very much to have the House adjourn and take up the matter in the morning, for a few minutes anyway.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, madam, and gentlemen, there is not the slightest doubt that the committee is endeavoring to minimize the evil of regulation. The committee has undoubtedly made an honest effort to bring in a bill which will do as little harm as possible. We can not afford to permit one man to make law. I have a great deal of respect for the President, and because I consider him a man of extraordinary ability I am afraid of him. If he were a commonplace man, or a man below the commonplace he would not be as dangerous as he is. The world is being remade. It is all in the crucible. Big men and great men have lost their bearings. Philosophers, thinkers, and statesmen have repudiated the accumulated notions of a lifetime in a day and have found themselves at odds with themselves and with their entire past.

The country finds itself to-day at war, many of us not knowing why. We have to-day cheered the representatives of France, and I have joined in greeting them. Every liberty-loving man throughout the world has an undying love for revolutionary France and sympathizes with her in her sorrow. [Applause.] We do not know whether we have allies or no allies. We do not know whether we are entering upon a partnership of facts or a partnership of beautiful words such as our President, the great artist of the spoken word, can wield. Is it a partnership of words, of phrases, or a partnership in fact? We do not know. What are the terms of the partnership? We do not know. Our great newspapers have not brought out anything about it. I am sorry for the man who gets all his information from the newspapers. Most newspapers are the greatest source of misinformation and miseducation. There are some newspapers that are more dangerous than all the inmates of all the jails of America.

When Gutenberg invented movable types he probably considered himself the benefactor of the race. He discovered something that would help convey thought and sentiment to his fellow men, and the press would be a blessing if it were honest—if it were not run by unclean interests. The old newspaper of the eighteenth century which represented the mind and conscience of an able man does not exist. It is the newspaper owned by some powerful corporation, by some railroad company, by some financial interest that commands the intellect of a man and kills the conscience and soul of the writer, that confronts us to-day.

Section 4 is a menace to freedom of the press, of the big paper, but Title XI is a menace to all. That is why I want to call your special attention to Title XI. There is nothing more oppressive in the world than a democracy gone mad than a democracy which has surrendered its rights to an individual. It is Title XI which permits any postmaster to exclude from the mails anything that he may consider treasonable or anarchistic. I was never so amused in my life as when I listened a few days ago to a discussion on this floor of what socialism and anarchy and nihilism mean. I did not participate in that discussion as I did not want to lend it dignity. I am going to reprint the RECORD showing that discussion, as an evidence of lack of information on a subject which intelligent men should know. It was particularly interesting in view of the fact——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LONDON. I would like to have five minutes more.

Mr. WEBB. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. LONDON. That one of the great Frenchmen whom we have honored to-day is a socialist. I am not going to enter upon a discussion of socialism and anarchism. Nihilism does not exist to-day. So far as socialism is concerned, it is the essence of industrial democracy. The socialists seek to apply to industry the principles which are supposed to govern the political relations of the individual to the State in a political democracy. Anarchism in its philosophic sense means the perfection of the individual to an extent which would make government unnecessary. It has absolutely nothing to do with terrorism. Terrorism is a question of methods and not a question of philosophy. A man may be a reactionary, a conservative, and still be a terrorist. The night riders who fought the Tobacco Trust with terrorism were not anarchists.

Title XI permits the Postmaster General to exclude things that he will consider treasonable, that he will consider anarchistic. It is an attack on the liberties of the little fellow, of the helpless man, of the defenseless man, and not on the powerful newspapers. The big newspapers will find plenty of champions here. They own the country. If you want to know what the President is thinking, read the great New York newspapers, and they will tell you in advance what you will do to-morrow. That has been our experience. So the big papers will take care of themselves and have plenty of supporters and friends here.

I want to lift my voice on behalf of free speech and the free word, both written and spoken. If there are any treasonable thoughts in the minds of the American people, I want them expressed; if there is any discontent with the war, I want to hear it. Is it or is it not treasonable to plead for international peace? Is it or is it not treasonable to demand a revocation of the war resolution? Is it or is it not treasonable to oppose the sending of an army abroad? Is it or is it not treasonable to complain that there is a shortage of food and incompetence in high places in dealing with the food problem? All such complaints are encouraging to the enemy. Shall we suppress them, or shall we find compensation in the opportunity to have wrongs righted by the curing power of free discussion?

I heard some people here attack certain utterances as treasonable which were nothing more than a protest against war I did not intend to make a speech on this section, because so many people spoke in favor of striking out this section. I am not going to enter upon a discussion of liberty. So many beautiful phrases have been uttered about that. It is evident that in every community where democratic principles rule there must be some restriction of the absolute rights of the individual. John Stuart Mill said in his book on "Liberty" that the great problem of civilization seems to be how to reconcile the largest measure of individual liberty with the highest welfare of the community. That seems to be the whole problem. That is the problem, stated in the fewest possible words.

Let us not surrender our individual rights at a time when we need to enlist, when we must enlist, the cooperation of every man and every woman. Let men speak freely. Do not drive them into the cellar of conspiracy. Do not turn people into hypocrites and cowards. Let us not, while we talk of fighting for liberty abroad, sacrifice and crush our liberties here.

That is why I am glad to see such a sentiment in favor of striking out section 4, and I hope also to see Title XI eliminated from this bill. I am entirely willing to vote for every measure that will guard the military and naval secrets of the country. Further than that I will not yield. I will not surrender any of the liberties of the humblest citizen of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I believe the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] has remaining only about 30 minutes, and I think I have about 30 minutes remaining, and as there is no one who wants to speak to-night, and as I understand my friend from Minnesota desires to yield some time to one or two Members to-morrow, I believe now that I will move that the House adjourn.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the question of the war with Germany, to embrace a speech, an address delivered before the Legislature of Texas by Hon. Jacob F. Walters.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, we can not hear the gentleman's request.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the question of the war with Germany, to embrace a speech made by Hon. Jacob F. Walters before the Legislature of Texas, along patriotic lines.

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, it is not customary for the House to insert in the RECORD speeches made by gentlemen outside, not connected with the House of Representatives. I would like to inquire how lengthy a speech it is?

Mr. MANSFIELD. It would make several pages of the RECORD.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the absence of the chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing, who usually acts as censor on these matters, I shall have to object.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend the remarks I made to-day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

REQUEST FOR LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on next Tuesday, after the reading of the Journal, I may have three-quarters of an hour in which to address the House on the subject of the revolution in Russia and its effect upon international peace.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, we can not forecast what important measures may be pending on Tuesday next.

Mr. LONDON. That is, of course, subject to all other business, important bills, and so forth.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman can make his request later in the week. For the time being, I shall have to object.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the request.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned, pursuant to the order previously made, until to-morrow, Friday, May 4, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

SENATE.

FRIDAY, May 4, 1917.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, May 2, 1917.)

The Senate reassembled at 12 o'clock m., on the expiration of the recess.

ADDRESS BY M. VIVIANI.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has received a translation of the address delivered by the French vice premier in the Senate Chamber on the 1st instant. If there is no objection, the Chair will order it printed in the RECORD, and when incorporated in the permanent RECORD it will be of value in future years.

PUNISHMENT OF ESPIONAGE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2) to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. OVERMAN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Husting	New	Smith, Md.
Bankhead	James	Norris	Smoot
Brady	Johnson, Cal.	Overman	Sterling
Chamberlain	Johnson, S. Dak.	Page	Thomas
Culberson	Jones, N. Mex.	Phelan	Thompson
Cummins	Jones, Wash.	Pittman	Townsend
Curtis	Kellogg	Robinson	Trammell
Dillingham	Kendrick	Saulsbury	Vardaman
Fernald	Kenyon	Shafroth	Walsh
Frelinghuysen	Knox	Sheppard	Warren
Gallinger	La Follette	Sherman	Watson
Gerry	McKellar	Smith, Ariz.	Wolcott
Hale	Myers	Smith, Ga.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES], on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] is detained from the Chamber on public business.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Michigan] and his pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] is unavoidably absent this morning.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I wish to announce the absence on account of illness of my colleague [Mr. LANE].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-one Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia obtained the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Will the Senator from Georgia permit me to present a report from the Committee on Printing?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is compelled under the rule to prevent the interruption of a Senator on the floor for the making of reports or any other business. The Senator from Georgia will proceed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate very briefly in the consideration of the substitute which I have offered.

The provision contained in the report from the Judiciary Committee gives nominally to the President the right to stop the exportation of any commodity he may see fit from the United States. The substitute which I have offered limits this control to commodities going to an enemy country.

Is it necessary at this time to declare upon the floor of the Senate by a majority vote that a condition exists where we deem it advisable to hang over every product of the United States the possibility of suspension of access to markets? The price of any commodity depends upon the market, in a large part, that it can reach. Has such a condition arisen that we are justified in saying to every producer in the United States we think it necessary to threaten your production with the order of an individual which will stop your markets?

Of course this work placed upon the President can not be performed by him. No human being could cover this work alone by himself. It means that some men in some bureau are to form conclusions, and as a result of their conclusions the production will be cut off from the markets of the world.

Our constituents understand that if the subject of cutting a particular commodity off from the markets of the world was to be considered by Congress they would have a hearing, for their Senators are within their reach. Their Representatives are within their reach, and they are likely to express the wish of the people of their State.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me? I am quite in sympathy with the Senator's contention, but I wish to suggest to the Senator that the evil he is complaining against is infinitesimal compared with what is proposed, if the Washington Post of this morning is reliable authority, so far as the immediate future is concerned.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Let us stop it now and be prepared to stop it further on.

Mr. GALLINGER. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Let me take, for instance, cotton, the chief commodity for market of my section. If a proposition was made to stop the export of cotton and cut the markets of the world off from the cotton producer, he would feel that he had his Senators and his Representatives, who would listen to him and probably heed his views. If it was to cut off corn, the Senators from Iowa, representing that great corn-producing State, would be within his reach to listen to him. If it was to cut off wheat, the Senators from the Dakotas would listen to their constituents. If it was to cut off some manufactured product of Pennsylvania, the Senators and Representatives of that State would be within the reach of their constituents and would listen to them. But we propose to transfer the power of destroying markets, not really to the President—he could not investigate the questions—but to some representative in the department, some bureau men to whom the people of the country do not have access.

Mr. OVERMAN. In war does not the President have to trust to his generals and the colonels and the captains in fighting the war? In carrying on war does he not have to trust his Cabinet and his subordinates? Is that a matter which can be regulated otherwise? It has to be done through his subordinates.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I answer the Senator, when it comes to handling the Army, yes; but when it comes to handling the commerce of the United States, that is not a war measure which we should delegate to the head of the War Department or to the head of any bureau. We can pass upon it better than they can. We could not pass upon the details of the management of troops in the field—that is not our business and that is not the business of our constituents at home—but when it comes to saying whether corn can be exported to the markets of the world, or whether it should be cut off from the markets of the world, we know more about it than the Army or Navy do, or any bureau, or than the President does.

I do not believe that the mere occupancy of a seat in the Cabinet, as Secretary to the President, transforms a man into superior knowledge. I have personally been aware of the fact that Cabinet men are not always fully qualified to fill the places they occupy, from my personal experience in filling such a place, although there is something about the occupancy of it that creates in the mind of the occupant a misconception of his own capacity. I have had that experience also.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator served as a Cabinet officer, and he was a very distinguished and able one. I have no doubt his advice to the President of the United States, Grover Cleveland, was very valuable to him.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I know I am ten times better qualified to-day than I was then, and I believe that there are Senators upon this floor fully as qualified, many of them, as any in the Cabinet. I deny that this is a question to be handled in such a way. It is not a matter of war now. It is a subject for us to pass upon if the emergency arises. The emergency has not arisen. I insist that for us to pass such a measure is to put a cloud over the industries of the country and to discourage production. This measure, if passed, will certainly discourage production all over our country——

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. STONE. What would the Senator consider to be an emergency of sufficient magnitude to warrant an embargo on the exportation of food products, whether the embargo should be laid by the President or directly by an act of Congress?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I can scarcely conceive of one.

Mr. STONE. Let me supplement my question by asking if it is true now or should later become true that there was a shortage of food supplies in the United States which threatened the well-being of the American people, would such a situation as that be an emergency?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There would then be a still further problem involved. With our allies, England and France, we are at war with Germany. I can not conceive of this country not producing foodstuffs enough, economically used, to feed the people of France, England, and the United States—all three. We could not afford an embargo that would starve France and England. That would be to invite German submarines to our shores and the war to our own shores. I do not believe that there is a danger of a shortage of foodstuffs that would lessen the necessities of life to the people of this country. We may deter production by threatening foodstuffs with prices that might be consequent upon an embargo. We must encourage production by letting it be known that markets will be preserved in which those who produce can dispose of their products.

The threat of an embargo is likely to check food production in the United States; it is likely to check all kinds of production; it is likely to bring about the difficulty that we so much desire to avoid.

If the occasion arises, let us ourselves pass upon it; let us keep in the minds of the people that there will be no embargo on anything unless their Congress, constitutionally authorized to pass upon such a subject, considers it and is prepared to justify the particular embargo. It will be time enough when it comes; but give the producer the assurance that it will not be accepted as having come until his own Senators and his own Representatives, to whom he can present his case, are prepared to justify before their constituents the embargo for which they vote. I believe it is essential to defeat this provision in order to preserve production. This is necessary for consumer as well as producer.

Mr. President, I have become earnestly convinced that what we need is not hysteria; what we need is not a manifestation of a willingness to wipe out all normal conditions; but, so far as we can, it is to preserve normal conditions, to give the industries of the country and the employment of those not called to arms the opportunity for work, for production, for sale, just as nearly normal as possible. The less we interfere the more normal they will be. I have for myself reached the conclusion that in levying taxes we should be very careful at this time not to so levy them as to mar the normal conditions of the country. Our effort should be to preserve the normal, not to destroy it. I do not desire to detain the Senate, and I will not do so. I believe the majority of the Judiciary Committee is to-day opposed to this provision.

Mr. OVERMAN. Oh, no.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Still, I believe it. I may be mistaken. This provision passed the Judiciary Committee; I took no part in it, because I understood the measure we were going to recommend was the one which I thought had been suggested by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], and until I read this provision in the Senate I supposed it was merely a provision to authorize the prevention of shipments of our goods to those countries which carry them on to an enemy country, substantially what I have embodied in the substitute. I have sought to embody in the substitute what I understood the Senator from Utah advocated in the Judiciary Committee. I shall not, however, detain the Senate.

Mr. OVERMAN. But the Senator from Georgia will remember that the Senator from Utah did not advocate that. He was satisfied with this amendment, and did not present his amendment at all.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I heard that mentioned, but I was not present.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from Georgia stated that the Senator from Utah had introduced a similar bill, but that bill was never before the Judiciary Committee, and this proposition was.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not say that it was formally before the committee, but it had been mentioned there, and the impression I gathered was that that was the measure which we were going to embody in the bill. I was called to another committee, where I thought my presence was necessary. For that reason I was not present in the Judiciary Committee when this provision was adopted.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, any subject being treated of with his customary vigor by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] or by the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], who has just now addressed the Senate, assumes an importance sometimes quite disproportionate to its real significance. Both of those Senators have in a discussion of the feature of the bill under consideration laid particular emphasis upon the fact that oftentimes when a general power is granted to the President of the United States the real obligation for action in the premises in the practical operation of the law devolves upon some subordinate in some department of the Government. Of course, Mr. President, if we could entertain at all the idea that this provision of this bill is to be put in operation upon the judgment or in accordance with the discretion of any clerk in one of the departments, everything that the Senators have said in opposition to it would be sound and ought to govern and influence the action of the Senate to reject it; but, Mr. President, I submit that the notion upon which the argument is based must be dismissed, notwithstanding the confidence with which it is advanced.

What is that power, Mr. President, that it is supposed will thus be delegated to a subordinate? Nothing that has been said by the Senators who have spoken upon this subject in opposition to the provision as it is found in the bill as now amended can add to the tremendous importance of the question before us as it must address itself to every Senator, involving, as it does, the shutting off of exports from this country to any other country, either altogether or with reference to particular commodities. Why, Mr. President, it does not make any difference how insignificant is the particular commodity that may be interdicted nor how insignificant is the foreign state to which the proclamation is directed or whose interests are involved, that state will be prompt to protest against any contemplated action upon the part of our Government under the power it is proposed to grant to the President. Unquestionably any attempt upon the part of the executive power to exercise the authority intended hereby to be granted to him will immediately give rise to an international complication.

Is it to be imagined for a single moment that an order of that character will be promulgated thoughtlessly upon the suggestion of some subordinate in any one of the departments? Why, Mr. President, it will not be put out, as it will probably be agreed upon reflection, even upon the suggestion of the head of a department. We can not conceive, Mr. President, that it ever will be issued except as a result of a Cabinet meeting, before which the move will be considered in all of its aspects and in all of its phases. The State Department, as a matter of course, will feel called upon to interpose upon any suggestion to resort to the authority to be conferred as a form of reprisal and to represent how it will affect our relations with the countries involved.

The amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] suggests one condition under which it may be advisable to exercise the power, namely, when the exports from this country to one of the neutral countries are, by the connivance of that country, allowed to go into the countries with which our country is at war. But, Mr. President, it may be desirable to bring pressure to bear upon some of the countries not yet parties to the war upon considerations quite outside of the question of their allowing exports from our country to get within the borders of enemy countries. There are many other ways in which neutral countries can be of material help to our enemies and of injury to us; and in negotiating with them, in order to insist upon their desisting from a course which is damaging to us, an act such as is now proposed will be a powerful weapon to put into the hands of the Executive. It will be a powerful argument to him to be able to say to them that, unless they desist from a course which we believe violative of their attitude of neutrality and destructive of our rights, we shall immediately suspend commercial relations with them.

Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] want the course we should take when differences arrive at that stage to be determined not in the secrecy of a Cabinet meeting and by the heads of the various departments in consultation with the Commander in Chief of the Army and the most conspicuous representative of the Nation, but by Congress. Why, Mr. President, we should be sorely crippled if in any such emergency involving a foreign country the President was obliged to relegate the subject to the legislative branch. He would have no means of forcing acquiescence in his legitimate demands upon neutral countries that are pursuing a policy inimical to our interests. They would recognize as a matter of course that action by Congress might or might not be helpful to the President. They would be prone to indulge the hope that his views would not prevail. They would recognize that local interests would be more or less powerful, and they know of the success with which legislation in Congress and in legislative bodies generally can be interrupted and delayed. That course, Mr. President, would weaken our executive branch in a most unfortunate way in the discharge of the grave duties which now devolve upon it.

In the English system they have the privy council, which handles all questions of this character. We have no such machinery in our form of government, but the nearest approach to it is the Cabinet meeting, at which the heads of the great departments of the Government, the constitutional advisers of the President, consult and confer with him. There, it seems to me, the power should be left.

Mr. President, I represent in part a great State which stands second among the States of the Union in the production of copper, and it is rapidly reaching a position of primacy in the production of zinc—two great commodities that are of first importance in the conduct of a war. It is fast reaching a place of first magnitude in the production of foodstuffs; and yet, Mr. President, I know I speak the sentiments of the people of the State of Montana when I say that they are perfectly willing to abide by any decision that is made by the President and his constitutional advisers to the effect that the safety of the country requires and demands that we cease commercial transactions with any of the neutral countries.

Mr. President, over a year ago I introduced a bill which, if passed, would have placed in the hands of the President the power to lay an embargo upon exports from this country to any country which, after warning by the Executive, persisted in a course that was violative of our international rights. I am perfectly willing to-day to intrust that power to the President in the midst of war; and I do not see how anyone who really considers the subject calmly and with an earnest desire to back up the President in any legitimate effort that he may make in this connection can hesitate for a moment to do so.

I think the chapter was wisely amended so as to leave it in such shape as that it can not be exercised by the President upon any consideration of what is for the public welfare as against the public safety; but as a war measure, for the purpose of aiding the President in bringing the strife to a speedy conclusion, I believe that we may safely intrust him and his constitutional advisers—his Cabinet—with the discretion to lay this embargo whenever in their judgment the public safety requires that it shall be done.

As was pointed out by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], there can be no serious question about the power of Congress thus to delegate the right to declare when the embargo is to become effective. An act substantially like the bill before us was passed in the year 1794, and received the signature of George Washington, the first President of the United States, who, as well, was the president of the Constitutional Convention. I think that he and those who participated with him in the formation of the organic law upon which our institutions rest did not disregard the spirit of that law, nor the obligation of the oath which they took to support the Constitution in the enactment of that measure, and I do not think we shall do so in the passage of this bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I do not rise so much to discuss the particular amendment under consideration as to call attention to the fact that the committee provision is but another example of the tendency of the Congress. I believe that we are legislating under hysteria; that the need of extraordinary action of the kind proposed is magnified beyond all due proportion to the necessities of the time. To mobilize and make efficient in the shortest practical time all of the country's resources is our very present duty, but to conjure evils and thus assail the foundations of constitutional government for remedies falsely labeled war emergencies is not only unnecessary but possibly dangerous.

I confess, Mr. President, that we know very little about our real war situation, and in submitting these remarks I am confident that I will not be properly subject to the criticism of partisanship, because I am in distinguished company, in the company of Democratic Senators who have supported the administration under all circumstances, and who, with me, feel that at this time it is proper to submit suggestions which are entirely pertinent to the occasion and disassociated from partisan politics. I repeat that the Congress knows little about the real situation. It is possible that the delegates appointed by the legislative branches of France and of England now here in our Capital may know something about it, but the Senate does not. It is expected to have implicit confidence in what is being proposed and unhesitatingly to yield its prerogatives to the Executive. I had supposed that the Senate, under the Constitution, was an advisory body to the President; but some Senators seem to feel that it is our duty to shift every difficult problem over to the Executive and confer upon him full authority to solve it and apply the result as to him may seem best.

I have voted an acknowledgment of the fact that we were engaged in war. I have voted emergency millions to the President to expend without check, and I shall continue to vote whatever money may seem to be necessary to carry on the war in which we are engaged; but I submit that it is not the duty nor the right of the Congress blindly to surrender its every responsibility and duty in this war to the Chief Executive.

This provision of the bill includes not only possible relief for certain emergencies in which some Senators are interested and for which they have spoken, but it gives the President such power, I submit, as few, if any, rulers of the world have ever possessed or possess now. It has been said by some one that if Russia has established a democracy the only two great autocracies left in the world are Germany and the United States, and I fear that there is very much truth in that statement.

A moment ago I referred to the fact that the Chief Executive of our country is now in consultation with the agents of the legislative branches of our two allies, France and Great Britain; but those agents are not in consultation with the legislative branch of our Government. No Members of the Congress have been called to the council chamber to consult as to what our country is to do in this crisis; as one of the humblest Members of this Congress, I feel that even I have a right to know. I protest against this condition, Mr. President. It is the duty of the Congress to know; and it should remain in session until it knows and performs its full duty. It should consider the problems that exist now and that will arise hereafter—emergencies that are subject to the action of Congress—and they should be met as it was intended that the Congress should meet them.

I believe that the people of the United States expect that Congress shall be something more than an indorser of ready-made, not understood, propositions. Outside of Washington this hysteria which affects the Capital is not felt so generally. I suppose the experience of other Senators is the same as my own. I am receiving letters and telegrams from good people in my State, who protest against the surrender by Congress of its prerogatives, even in what are called emergencies, but which are not always so, and which can be successfully met by helpful cooperation between the President and Congress.

Mr. President, while I understand that, possibly, it may be unpopular to submit these remarks, I nevertheless feel it my duty to protest against this surrender of responsibility on the part of the Congress to the President of the United States, however good and wise and patriotic he may be. I suppose that when you give the unlimited power contained in this section and in other sections of this bill you will then enact the espionage clause. You will vote it into the bill in order to prevent any criticism of the conduct of the war or a disclosure of all the facts to the people. Will you brand as an enemy to his country he who dares to call attention to conditions which exist? The success of this war may depend upon the patriotic support of our people. It is their war now, no matter how reluctant they may have been to enter it. They have a right to know all about it and to be represented fully by their Congress.

Mr. President, I do not think many propositions of this bill are in the interest of patriotism. I do not think they are in the interest of effective democracy. I would enact laws imposing penalties capital in their nature, if need be, upon a traitor to this country, whether foreign or native born, but I would not destroy the press or close the mouths of the people in their efforts to present to the country the facts as they exist in reference to this war. Never before, however, in our history have we taken the position that even a President can make no mistakes. Never before have we acknowledged that democracy is inefficient to meet any emergency. The Congress has demonstrated its desire to stand by the President. There is no division of sentiment in that respect here or elsewhere. He is receiving the patriotic support of all of the people; but because the Congress is patriotic, because it is generous to the utmost degree with the people's money, because it equips its Commander in Chief with every facility for success, because it upholds the President in his mighty responsibilities, is that a reason or an excuse for the Senate to vacate its duties, its responsibilities?

Mr. President, the particular example cited by the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD], as it applies to tin plate, affects many citizens of my State very materially. We have many good people up there engaged in the canning business. They confer a benefit upon the farmers all about and are a very important factor in food conservation; and if a specific provision to meet the apparent tin-plate emergency were presented, Congress itself could afford relief, and I would gladly support it. But when you cover it into a blanket provision which permits the President of the United States to use unlimited power in any way which may to him appear good, it seems to me that you entirely depart from the theory of our Republic.

Of course, the argument of the Senator from Montana is good, so far as efficiency is concerned; and it applies to all autocracies. A supreme man at the head of a country, one with all wisdom and all power and all goodness, could undoubtedly give a more efficient and probably a better government than a republic could give; we know that such a man does not live; none such has ever lived; but that is not our theory of government. We have been experimenting for more than a century and a quarter in self-government through legislatures. The Congress of the United States is composed of representatives of the people and is supposed to speak for them. This suggestion in the Washington morning papers that Congress surrender absolutely and turn over its business to the President and go home does not find any favorable response in my mind or heart. If our system of government did not forbid it, our experience of the last few years would still induce me to oppose transferring all power to the Executive.

Our duty is here. These problems, however difficult, must be solved by men. When we were elected it was with the presumption that we had the ability to represent the people and to perform the duties which the Constitution had imposed upon us. We have not tried. The proposition is not to try. It is this tendency toward autocracy against which I protest, not so much against the particular section under consideration. That is but one instance of the menace contained in this bill, and there are other measures which have been presented and which may be presented to Congress illustrative of this serious condition.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to ask the Senator how much in detail he would like the Congress to consider the questions which are now before the Senate and the subject of the remarks of Senators? Would the Senator suggest having Congress decide whether or not any particular commodity should cease to be exported? Would he have the Congress take up the details as to whether or not cotton, for instance, should be exported? And if so, would he go further and have the Congress consider the question as to whether cotton should be exported to Italy or not? To what extent would he advocate legislation upon this question of exports?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I would do in a particular case just as I would do on any other question that came before Congress for its consideration. I do not believe that we have reached the point in this matter under consideration where it is necessary for the Congress to act in this blanket manner; but if Senators think we have reached that point in reference to any particular product, I would legislate upon that directly. I would do as we do in other matters of legislation—legislate fully on the subject.

Mr. President, I do not care to detain the Senate longer. As I said to begin with, I rose simply to utter a protest rather than to discuss in detail the provisions of the bill. They have already been discussed, and there have been some speeches made on the floor of the Senate during the last few days which will be a credit to the United States Senate when its record has been completely written. They are some evidence of the ability, at least, of some Senators.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the Senator has said we are standing by the President. I protest that at the very outset of this war Senators refuse to give him their confidence. One Senator upon this floor complains that, forsooth, the President of the United States, through his Attorney General, is guilty of the crime of sending down a bill for the Judiciary Committee to consider and suggesting what ought to be done. This seventh chapter was not included in the original bill sent down here, but it was sent, and introduced not by me, but by another member of the Judiciary Committee at the request of the Attorney General. Is that a crime? It is only a suggestion to Congress and a suggestion to the committee.

This original bill was introduced and passed through the committee and passed the Senate. It was considered for six weeks in the Committee on the Judiciary, every line of it. The President of the United States, when we declared war and put in his hands the direction of affairs and gave him $100,000,000 and told him to conduct this war, gathered around him his advisers, the Cabinet, and asked what legislation was necessary to safely conduct the war. He sent down to the Senate, as it was his duty to do, a request to Congress to invest him with certain powers that he might conduct the war successfully. Then, Mr. President, three or four weeks ago information came to the President of the United States that this country was sending food, clothing, wheat, and everything to the Germans through neutral countries; and then it was, with that information in his possession, that the President gathered his advisers around him, and said: "What am I to do? I ask for some power that I may stop the furnishing of supplies to our enemies, feeding them when our allies are starving to death, and even our people at home are starving to death"; and yet here Senators upon this floor decline to vest that authority in him. They do not have that confidence in him. They are afraid to trust him with finding as a fact that the very safety of our Republic is at stake.

What are we going to do about it? What are you going to do about it? Are you going to let this corn and wheat and clothing and other things be shipped to the Germans? Shall it continue to go on and go on, and Congress sit here and talk and talk and talk for weeks and weeks before any bill is passed, because, forsooth, some Senator from some section of the country is opposed to it? Shall we have criticism of the President because he asks us for power to carry on the war successfully?

I protest that we are not giving him our confidence. I say a vote here for these amendments and against this bill is a vote of lack of confidence right at the outset of this war. Is it constitutional? If it is unconstitutional, I say I would ask no Senator to vote for it; but if there is doubt about it, as a Senator said in connection with the child-labor case, give the President the benefit of the doubt; and if he is to fight this war, rest your confidence in him that he will not do any great wrong to his people, that he will not make this proclamation unless he finds as a fact that our own Republic is in danger and it is necessary for him to declare an embargo if he is going to fight a successful war.

What are you going to do about it? Will some Senator tell me what you are going to do about it? Does the Senator from Michigan want us to sit here and wait for information to come through the diplomatic channels that this thing which is being done in other countries ought to be stopped, and then send a message down here and let us discuss it for a month? Or will you trust the President and repose this power in him, if it is constitutional?—and I believe it is.

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] made an argument here upon the same principles as adopted in the Great Northern Securities case—and he is a great lawyer—that this is constitutional. I believe it is constitutional, and three or more of the lawyers of this great committee—nearly all of them, with probably four exceptions—say it is constitutional. Then if you have no doubts, or even if you have a doubt of its constitutionality, let us trust our leader in time of war. Let us give him the power, because I believe he will exercise it justly. I do not believe he will put an embargo on cotton.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, he will never by my vote have the power to do it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am willing to trust him and give him the power, because I know unless he finds it is necessary for the safety of this Republic that he will never put an embargo on it. I know he will never put an embargo on anything else unless he finds as a fact, or as the proposed law says, that the safety of the Republic demands it.

Mr. WATSON and Mr. TOWNSEND addressed the Chair.

Mr. OVERMAN. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. I saw in the paper this morning a statement that a bill has been introduced——

Mr. OVERMAN. Oh, Mr. President, do not let us discuss that bill. We will discuss it when it comes here.

Mr. WATSON. I want to know of the Senator just how far he wants to trust the President, this President or any other President. He says we must have confidence in the President.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. How far are you willing to trust the President?

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to trust him this far, that if he finds the enemy to-day are fed and clothed from this country he shall have the power to stop food from going from this country to that country. That is as far as I want to go now, and when further power is sought I will take that up later. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator has repeated that statement, which is a surprise to me. How long has the President known that the United States was shipping foodstuffs to Germany?

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I do not know except as the information came. Perhaps I ought not to state it. Some things occur in committees that can not be said upon the floor; but there has been so much said about it I concluded I would make a clean breast of it and tell what did occur. How long it has been known I do not know.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Do you not think, Mr. President, that it is the duty of Congress or it is the privilege of Congress to know that?

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, when we were fighting the little Spanish War, when President McKinley came to Congress and asked for practically the same power that is asked here, you did not hear a Senator talking about its constitutionality. You did not hear Senators talking about being afraid to trust him and that Congress ought to do it. That Congress was then composed of the greatest lawyers in this country. There never have been such lawyers in this body as sat here then, and they marched up without any opposition at all and conferred this right upon President McKinley. Do you tell me here now that you want to help the President? The precedent is upon the statute books in that act passed by Congress.

Mr. WATSON. If the object of this legislation is to prevent the shipping of food products from this country through neutral countries to an enemy country, and that is the sole object, as I understand the Senator from North Carolina——

Mr. OVERMAN. No; I did not say it was the sole object.

Mr. WATSON. Then why not adopt the amendment of the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. OVERMAN. If we are going to go that far, if that is constitutional, let us extend the power. We can not tell what is going to happen. The Senator from Georgia admits that it is constitutional by his amendment, and his amendment is all right as far as it goes, but it is limited. When we adjourn here we do not know what is going to happen. As the Senator from Montana has said, a thousand things may arise during this war where it may be necessary for the public defense that the President of the United States should have power to put an embargo on exports. I am willing to trust him if it is constitutional. Are you? You who think it is unconstitutional vote against it, but you who are willing to trust the President to do right and to fight the war successfully vote for this amendment and let us pass the bill.

He has said, "I can not fight this war successfully unless Congress authorizes me to do things as I think they ought to be done." He has submitted this measure to the Department of State, and he has submitted it to the Attorney General, and the Attorney General wrote us and advised us that it was constitutional, and therefore the President walked down and said: "Give me this authority; I need it. The safety of the Republic is in danger. I need this authority. Give me this authority." Why not? What are you going to do about it?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

Mr. OVERMAN. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. The Senator speaks of Congress adjourning. I should like to ask him if he thinks Congress is likely to adjourn unless provision is made for a joint committee on the conduct of the war?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not know anything about that. I do not know whether that is meant as a threat or not. That is a matter now before the committee for consideration. I do not know whether Congress is going to adjourn or not; but, Mr. President, there comes to the President of the United States, through diplomatic channels and through the Secretary of State, information sometimes that ought not to be given out; information which makes it necessary for the safety of this Republic that he should exercise certain authority, and the power ought to be given to him to exercise it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. May I interrupt the Senator one moment? What message does the Senator refer to that the President has submitted to Congress asking for this particular power?

Mr. OVERMAN. He has asked it, and sent, through the Attorney General, this single measure, solitary and alone, which we put into this bill in order to get it through speedily.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Is that the message to which the Senator refers?

Mr. OVERMAN. No message was sent, but I say it came through the Attorney General.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator referred to a message from the President.

Mr. OVERMAN. No; the Senator is mistaken. If I did, I did not mean it. I know of no message.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I wish to get a little information about that. The Attorney General a good while ago wrote a number of bills, which were presented to the Judiciary Committee. They contained some very radical propositions. The particular chapter which we are now discussing was one of those bills.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. REED. As I understand it.

Mr. OVERMAN. It was not one of the original 12 or 13 bills sent down.

Mr. REED. There were originally 13 bills, or something like that number, sent in at the last Congress. At this session of Congress those same bills were returned to the committee of the Senate, and in addition to those 13 was the bill that is now under discussion, known as Chapter VII.

Mr. OVERMAN. No; this was sent down later. I do not think the Senator was even on the subcommittee. It was considered by the subcommittee, according to my recollection.

Mr. REED. I want to know if it did not come to the committee just as the others did, through the Attorney General as the suggestion of the Attorney General.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think not, Mr. President. It was sent down probably to the chairman of the committee, who introduced the bill very much later than the other bills, because the Senator from Utah some time ago had a bill very much like it introduced, and he was surprised three weeks ago when in the committee he found the Attorney General had sent down another bill to carry out the idea.

Mr. REED. What I am getting at is this: The Attorney General had drawn a number of bills. He afterwards drew two or three more bills, not this one but others.

Mr. OVERMAN. This was later.

Mr. REED. It came to the committee through the Attorney General. I want to know if the Senator means to tell us that the President of the United States singled out this bill, which now appears here as Chapter VII, and sent it down with any special request or message other than, or different from, that which may be assumed as to the other bills.

Mr. OVERMAN. I thought I had already stated that the President at the outset of the war discussed, as he should have done, with the Secretary of State, the Secretary of War, and all the Cabinet, as to what legislation was necessary for him to have from Congress in order to carry the war to a successful end. In pursuance of that the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of State, together with the Attorney General, prepared some 13 bills and sent them to us, not that Congress should enact those bills but in order to carry out the suggestions of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Navy and the other Secretaries. They sent the 13 bills here, which the committee sent to a subcommittee. The 13 were considered in the subcommittee and then reported to the full committee, and I thought we never would get them reported out. They were discussed in the committee for months, and just before the close of the Congress on the 4th of March we reported them out, too late for the House of Representatives to pass them.

Then the Attorney General, giving the history of it, as I understand it, sent down these bills again as amended by the committee. He sent them down like the Senate had amended them and the House had amended them, saying they were very important, and he desired to have them brought to the consideration of Congress for passage again. Then the subcommittee—the Senator from Missouri being on the subcommittee—began to consider those bills. Subsequently, I think, my recollection is, after we reported it, this bill that we are talking about now was sent by the Attorney General from the President, he giving the information which I have stated, that certain neutral countries were furnishing food to Germany. I can not mention the countries now, but it was said they were furnishing food to the Germans.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator state that that information was ever given to the subcommittee of which I was a member?

Mr. OVERMAN. No, sir; I said the Senator was not on the subcommittee, but the committee had reported it out. My recollection is he was on the subcommittee except as to this bill. You were on the subcommittee on all the other chapters, every one, except this.

Mr. REED. I say no such information as the Senator is now giving was ever laid before a subcommittee of which I was a member.

Mr. OVERMAN. I said that.

Mr. REED. Or was ever laid before the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. OVERMAN. When you were present?

Mr. REED. When I was present.

Mr. OVERMAN. I accept that.

Mr. REED. I now make the further statement that if the Senator will write into this bill a provision that when the President finds that there are supplies being sent from this country to our enemy or sent to other countries and forwarded on to our enemy he shall have the power to stop that I would myself guarantee that there will not be a vote in the Senate against that proposition.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator, then, thinks that would be constitutional?

Mr. REED. Undoubtedly it is constitutional; and you have heard me raise no constitutional objection to it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I know the Senator is a great lawyer, and I want to bring out the fact that he thinks it is not unconstitutional.

Mr. REED. That proposition would undoubtedly be right; and undoubtedly, in my opinion, it would be constitutional if Congress was to say that upon the happening of this particular fact the President should exercise a particular power; that having the power it can be reasonably said to be exercised in pursuance of the war or in support of the war. I have not the slightest doubt of its constitutionality, and I have heard no lawyer here make an argument to the contrary.

Mr. CUMMINS. No lawyer here has made an argument to the contrary or questioned the constitutionality of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia. So far as I am concerned, I certainly do not.

Mr. OVERMAN. If we give him the power by proclamation to place an embargo upon wheat going from the United States to foreign countries and to Germany, I can not understand why we can not give him the power to find as a fact that the public safety requires that certain other things should be done.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will pardon me, I do not want him to get away from the proposition of the President having made a special request with reference to the particular bill we are now discussing.

Mr. OVERMAN. All right.

Mr. REED. I now understand the Senator to say nothing more nor less than this: There were a number of bills sent down at the previous session of Congress. They came to us through the various Cabinet officers and as the suggestions of those departments. Subsequently, and at this session of Congress, the Attorney General brought in one or two or, perhaps, three more bills, and among those was this particular measure.

Mr. OVERMAN. No; I do not think so. I do not recollect that there were two or three more. I said a number. I remember this one in particular.

Mr. REED. That this bill was presented as the bill which was desired, I have not yet heard in the committee; and I want to know if the Senator means to say now that the President sent any special request.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not say that. The Attorney General had the information and came to the committee.

Mr. REED. I was present when the Attorney General was there and discussed it.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator did not see the Attorney General's letter and he did not have any conversation with him, I suppose.

Mr. REED. I am talking about the subcommittee.

Mr. OVERMAN. We called upon him about the other bills. He came there, as the Senator knows, upon other bills. We did not send for him to come about this bill.

Mr. REED. Of course, if there is a grapevine somewhere that the Senator has been in touch with and has been getting information by conversation and by letter——

Mr. OVERMAN. I got this from the newspapers also, and the Senator did, too.

Mr. REED. Very well. Now, I think that is about the situation, that instead of the President having sent down to the committee a request to pass this particular bill, all the Senator knows about it is that the Attorney General brought it down there and asked to have it passed, and probably wrote a letter in relation to it, and the newspapers have printed statements about it. That is a very different proposition from the one which the Senator was making a little while ago.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Attorney General did not bring it down; he did not come there with it at all.

Mr. REED. Then we are further off from it than we were a minute ago.

Mr. OVERMAN. I say he sent us another bill and asked us to pass it; and the Attorney General said the bill was indorsed by the President. He would not have come here with it if the President had not advocated it and wanted it.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I do not fully understand what the Senator from North Carolina says. Does the Senator mean to say that the Attorney General drafted this bill?

Mr. OVERMAN. I think he did, and I have no objection to it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. OVERMAN. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. I thought my recollection was correct. I have the letter now here, over the signature of the President, recommending the passage of the bill. I sent to the Judiciary Committee room and secured it. I ask that it be read at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KENDRICK in the chair). The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, April 14, 1917.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am taking the liberty of sending you the draft of a suggested bill permitting the President to control exports, for the purpose of seeing to it that the resources of the country are used in the most effective way for the prosecution of the present war rather than diverted to countries or quarters where they are less needed.

I send also extracts from the letter of the Attorney General, which accompanied these drafts when he was kind enough to submit them to me at my request:

"As to section 3 appearing in the informal draft marked 'A,' that was intended to make the proposed legislation fit into chapter 6 of the so-called omnibus bill now pending in Congress covering foreign relations, neutrality, espionage, etc.——

Mr. OVERMAN. What is the date of the letter?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The 14th of April.

Mr. OVERMAN. Every statement that I have made, then, Mr. President, is true, and it did not come exactly from newspapers. I am sorry the Senator from Missouri was not a little more regular in his attendance on the committee. Probably he would have heard the letter read.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that is a very unnecessary remark to make.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I hope the Secretary will conclude the reading of the letter.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from Missouri said he had not heard it.

Mr. REED. It is not always the number of times a man attends a committee that measures his usefulness. Sometimes the character of his service there is equally important.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator seemed to doubt my statement.

Mr. REED. The Senator's own statement was at variance with the fact. The Senator from Montana has just presented the letter. The Senator from North Carolina had forgotten about it evidently.

Mr. OVERMAN. I said the statement was made before the committee. I did not remember who made it, whether it was the Attorney General or the chairman or who made it.

Mr. REED. Manifestly the Senator had forgotten about the letter.

Mr. OVERMAN. I did forget that the letter was written, but I would not make a statement unless it was true.

Mr. REED. Then, why will the Senator criticize me and say I was not present?

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator was not present or he would not have said what he did.

Mr. REED. Since the statement has been made let me say that I have been present at the Judiciary Committee every single Monday morning except when I have been compelled to attend other committees that had important work at that time.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to say to the Senator that he is one of the most regular attendants on the committee, and one of the ablest lawyers on the committee, and we like to have him discuss questions, because no man discusses them so ably. But he was not present when this letter was read or he would not have made the statement he did and criticized me as he did a few minutes ago about the matter. He acted like I was a witness on the stand, and he as a lawyer cross-examined me. He knows how to get men in trouble in that way and he thought he had me. I am very glad the Senator from Montana came with the letter to help me out.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, can we not have the entire letter read? I think it is important.

Mr. REED. I think the incident might as well be dropped now.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think so.

Mr. REED. However, I should like to conclude my remark.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not understand why I should have been interrupted in making the statement I did.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I ask that the letter be read.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not care to yield any further. I want the whole letter read. The Senator from New Hampshire has asked that it be read, and it ought to be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read the letter.

Mr. REED. I have been interrupted here, and interrupted out of order, when I had a right to speak. I want to conclude my sentence. I should not have been interrupted. I simply rose to say that in the heat of debate the Senator from North Carolina had made statements which, in my judgment, were calculated to reflect upon the members of the committee——

Mr. OVERMAN. I never intended to do so.

Mr. REED. And to hold the members of the committee up as antagonizing the President in matters concerning which he had personally asked to be given authority to act. I thought it proper to ask the Senator some questions with reference to that. Now that the thing has calmed down, I understand that the Senator does not mean, and has not meant, any more than simply to assert that this bill was sent to the committee with the letter of the President, which is about to be read; that the bill has since been changed in some respects by the Senate, and with the Senator's consent, and we are now discussing whether there should be further changes. There has been no reflection upon anybody and none has been intended.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have not meant to reflect on any of my colleagues; and if I did so, I take it back. I was only stating as nearly as I could the truth about it. That is all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire asked that the letter be read in full.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; let it be read.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will yield after the letter shall have been read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letter will be read.

The Secretary read the letter, as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, 14 April, 1917.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am taking the liberty of sending you the draft of a suggested bill permitting the President to control exports for the purpose of seeing to it that the resources of the country are used in the most effective way for the prosecution of the present war rather than diverted to countries or quarters where they are less needed.

I send also extracts from the letter of the Attorney General which accompanied these drafts when he was kind enough to submit them to me at my request:

"As to Section 3 appearing in the informal draft marked "A," that was intended to make the proposed legislation fit into Chapter 6 of the so-called Omnibus Bill now pending in Congress covering foreign relations, neutrality, espionage, etc.; this bill has not yet been passed, and at this time it is not possible to tell whether it or the bill we are now considering will first go through Congress. Therefore, to avoid confusion, we have concluded to strike out Section 3 as it appears in draft "A" and meet that situation by asking the Judiciary Committee so to amend Chapter 6 of the Omnibus Bill as to include "articles the export of which is made unlawful by or under any statute."

"I am therefore sending you also three copies of the formal draft we have finally determined on marked "B" consisting of Sections 1 and 2 of original draft "A," eliminating Section 3 of that draft, and adding a new Section 3 to the finally proposed draft, this Section 3 merely providing additional safeguards and penalties in enforcing the provisions of the legislation we are now proposing."

I feel confident that the policy embodied in such a measure will commend itself to your judgment and therefore I feel at liberty to urge it upon your favorable attention.

The Attorney General will be glad to put himself at your disposal for the discussion of any aspect of this legislation which he has considered at my request.

With much regard,

Cordially and sincerely yours, WOODROW WILSON.

Encs.

HON. CHARLES A. CULBERSON,
United States Senate.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator has heard the letter read. What does the Attorney General say? He takes up the amendment adopted in the Senate and the amendment adopted in the other House and tries to conform the two amendments adopted in the House and in the Senate, respectively, which were passed by both bodies, showing he is only making the suggestion and and carrying out, so far as he can, the ideas of Congress.

I have said about all I had to say in reference to the matter. I do not desire to criticize anybody, but when I am charged with the duty and ordered by the committee to bring this bill in here, and when I find that Senators who sat in the committee without opposing the provision and without making such a fight as they are now making here upon the floor of the Senate, and making it as an afterthought; and when I find some Senators criticizing the President and saying that we are not ready to give him this power, I do feel a little bit indignant about it.

When I cited the precedent where Congress in the Spanish-American War gave this power to the President some Senator criticized me for assuming that the President had asked for this power. He did ask for it, and the Attorney General asked for it. Under such circumstances I naturally felt somewhat annoyed. I have the kindest feeling for my colleagues. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] is the last man I would reflect upon, because he has given such wonderful service to the committee; but I have spoken just as I felt about the matter.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, Senators know my fondness for the Senator from North Carolina; I am very much attached to him personally and have the greatest regard for him. He and I each came from the same section of North Carolina, although I am now from Georgia. Our ancestors have been friends for over a hundred years.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is mutual, and I love the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I dislike to differ with the Senator from North Carolina, but I am intensely against the provision as it came from the Judiciary Committee. I am sorry I was not in the committee at the time to voice my objection then, but I was not; and I should fail in my duty as a Senator now, with my convictions on the subject, if I did not voice my objection here.

If the Senator from North Carolina had not been charged with the responsibility of carrying this measure through, I would feel like appealing to him to support my substitute, and I would not be uneasy about obtaining his help, for away down inside of his heart his feeling is such that if it were left to him as an original proposition he would, in my judgment, take the substitute instead of the provision contained in section 1 of Chapter VII.

Now, with reference to the President, just a word. Is there a man on the floor who has given the President for the past four years more intense support than I have or who has admired him more than I do? I doubt it. But if I could combine Col. Roosevelt and Col. Bryan and Mr. Taft and the President all in one, and get all that was best in each of the four, and take out of that composite man all that was objectionable in either of the four and put him in the White House, I would not vote for the provision contained in section 1 of Chapter VII, even if he had recommended it.

Mr. President, the power proposed to be conferred is not limited to President Wilson. It would apply to all future Presidents in any kind of war, however small, in which we might be engaged. Is it a reflection upon the President to object to putting upon him a responsibility which the law puts upon the Congress? I do not think so. Suppose I should present a joint resolution declaring that "Whereas a condition of war exists, and whereas it is important that Congress should adjourn and go home; therefore be it resolved, that whenever the President finds the public safety so requires he is hereby authorized to suspend any existing law and enact any new one that he sees fit." I would hesitate about voting for such a joint resolution; but I would not feel that in failing to support it I was lacking in confidence in the President or in admiration for him. To object to loading him with responsibilities that belong to us is no reflection upon him.

But it has been suggested that the President has approved this proposed legislation. Why, he has not, Mr. President. I have heard his letter read; and pardon me for saying that I have some knowledge of how officers of departments bring bills to the President and how he sends them to committees of Congress. It is utterly impossible for a President to study in detail and master every bill that the head of one of his departments may desire to present to Congress. Take the length of time it has required for the Judiciary Committee to study this bill. Why, the President probably read it in half an hour, if he read it at all. Pardon me for saying that when I was Secretary of the Interior I submitted bills to the President of the United States and obtained letters from him, transmitting them with his commendation to the chairman of a committee of Congress, that he knew practically nothing about, and I would write the letter for him. So for Congress to accept the view that the President has mastered in detail a bill of this kind because he sends it to Congress for the consideration of a committee is utterly to misconceive the truth. It is impossible for any human being occupying the office of President, if he combined all the wisdom that has been possessed since the days of Solomon, to master in detail the various pieces of legislation presented to him.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia whether he feels that the President has not seriously reflected upon the main idea of the bill under consideration, reposing in him the power to prohibit exports?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I hope not; I do not know.

Mr. WALSH. I do not ask what the Senator hopes; but does he seriously believe that the President asks for the granting of such power to him without having seriously reflected upon it?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Very well.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I can not believe that he seriously grasped the extent of this proposition.

Mr. WALSH. That was not the question I asked the Senator at all. I asked him as to whether he thought the President had not seriously reflected upon the main idea of the bill, vesting in the President the power to lay embargoes on exports? Will the Senator, then, give us some idea, if he has any, as to the officer who is responsible for the idea and with whom it does originate?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. My opinion would be that it originated with the Department of Justice, along with a number of other suggestions, and that they came to the Judiciary Committee to thrash the matter out.

Mr. WALSH. Let me inquire of the Senator now if he seriously doubts that the matter has been the subject of consideration at a Cabinet meeting?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I suppose it has been, but I would not accept such a consideration as thorough. A bill of this kind could not in a week's time be thoroughly mastered if all the Cabinet meetings were given up to its consideration.

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator will pardon me, I understand the position of the Senator perfectly with respect to this question. He is opposed to it, no matter who brought it here.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I would be; yes.

Mr. WALSH. I am merely desiring to direct attention to the fact that it has had, and must have had, the serious consideration of not only the President, but of the Cabinet before it could be adopted as a governmental policy.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Well, frankly, I do not think that would be as serious a consideration as would come from consideration by a committee of either House of Congress. What I am pressing is that we should not accept and be seriously influenced by a conclusion of others in arriving at which, it was utterly impossible for them to give that care and considerate thought that we should give to the subject matter.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me further, I simply meant to indicate that it occurred to me that the debate ought to proceed upon the assumption that the proposal had had the serious consideration, in its main ideas, of the President and his Cabinet, and that we are not considering a question here that originated with some insignificant subordinate in one of the departments.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Well, I do not know how seriously I would consider it, even then. I have known Cabinet officers frequently to ask support of measures which when criticized before them they have seen were unsound. The real value of the Senate and of the House of Representatives is that we, and not men busy with administration, should legislate. It is all right for others to give us their suggestions, but we ought not to be overwhelmed by them. Frankly, if the Senator desires my opinion, I would say, if the President asked me to vote for such a provision as that reported by the committee, I would say to him, "I can not do so, Mr. President; I can not vote for it, and I wish to show you why I hope you will not press it." As a representative from my State I would feel that if I failed to take that course I ought to be ready to tender my resignation and go home.

Mr. President, there has not a reason been given in favor of this section. The argument of the Senator from North Carolina was that some country might ship into Germany our goods and that that must be stopped. The necessity for the legislation, beyond stopping shipments to enemy countries, has not been made apparent. No doubt that was what was in the mind of the President, but the language drawn is broader than it ought to have been. The substitute I have offered fully gives to the President everything that the argument presented here justifies. I believe that should be given. I do not favor doing more. I do not believe the President would use any more power if we gave it; I have not the slightest idea that he would. But I do not want Congress to say to the industries of this country, "We are so hysterical about the situation that we have felt called upon to vest in the Executive the power to stop the exportation of any of your commodities whenever he may think it desirable."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, may I again interrupt the Senator from Georgia?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. The newspapers, Mr. President, have carried information within the last few days to the effect that a secret treaty exists between the Republic of Chile and the Imperial Government of Germany. I do not credit the report at all, but I desire the Senator from Georgia to assume that such a condition of things exists, and, as a consequence of that treaty, the Republic of Chile gives aid and comfort of the most substantial character to the public enemies of this country. Chile is dependent for her very existence now, under the present condition of things, upon exports of an important character from this country. Would the Senator from Georgia like to put into the hands of the President the power to say to Chile, "You must desist from this course or we will suspend exports to your country"?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not know that I would; not unless I knew more about it than the Senator has stated.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, I have stated very little. The Department of State may know vastly more about it than I do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We are still quite dependent upon Chile.

Mr. WALSH. Surely.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We are as much interested in getting saltpeter from Chile as Chile is in getting certain commodities from us. Now, if the time should come that Chile arbitrarily, in the interest of Germany, said that the United States should have no more saltpeter from Chile, that would raise an issue that would be worthy of immediate consideration. It is the broad blanket of distrust that we throw over every industry in the United States against which I protest, which I say nothing has been shown to the Senate to justify. If a particular occasion arises, we can handle it. We are going to be here for 30 days longer, anyhow. Let us not be so hysterical as to put this shadow of doubt over all production in the country.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, perhaps I should not prolong this discussion; but the argument of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] reminds me that in the consideration of this amendment the consumer and the interests of the consumer seem to have been lost sight of. In fact, in all of our legislation that is apt to be the case. Every burden imposed, and particularly by our revenue laws, upon any industry, with perhaps a possible exception here and there, ultimately rests on the consumer. He is the common victim of every enterprise and of every conspiracy affecting the laws of trade and diverting them in unnatural directions.

If we levy taxes, they are shifted to the consumer. If we penalize corporations, the penalties are shifted to the consumer; corners are made in the necessaries of life and the burden finds its ultimate resting place upon the shoulders of the consumer.

The argument thus far, if I have correctly followed it, has been urged in the interest of the producer, and the consequence to him has formed the chief burden of opposition to the section.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. My suggestion was, in my opening remarks, that this would discourage production and defeat the very thing we have in view—that there should be ample production, which we could only hope for by holding out to producers a broad market.

Mr. THOMAS. Well, Mr. President, the discouragement may be in the limitation of the market and in the consequent difficulty of maintaining existing prices for production.

The consumer can stand many things, but there is a limit even to his capacity to respond to and sustain the burdens that are constantly imposed upon his shoulders. While listening to the President's letter, the thought occurred to me that the purpose behind the section reported by the committee was not entirely confined to possible shipments and abuses of our export trade with belligerents, or with neutrals trading with belligerents, but that it had behind it as well the welfare of the people of this country. The instance presented so fully by the Senator from Maine is in point. If we are threatened with a famine in containers—and I now neither assert nor deny that proposition—then the danger to the domestic consumers is the same, whether the export of containers is to a neutral or to a belligerent; consequently, we should arm the President with power, if we are to arm him at all, to guard as well the interests of the home consumer growing out of the undue exportations to this, that, or the other country as to guard against exportations to a belligerent, particularly as he probably has that power without further legislation.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. REED. The Senator is now putting upon this section a construction of which I understand the chairman of the committee claims that it is not susceptible; that is, that under the bill presented the President can exercise this power of embargo, not for the purpose of carrying on the war alone and for military reasons but for the benefit of the consumers of the country. Now, I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the chairman of the committee consented to have the words "or welfare" stricken out of the clause "whenever the United States is at war and the President shall find that the public safety or welfare shall so require," so that the clause as it now stands has the words "or welfare" omitted. Hence the sole power now sought to be conferred, according to the language of the section, is one limited to the war power. The sole power is a power connected with the war authority of the President. Consequently I call the Senator's attention to the fact that if he is correct in his diagnosis of the case he ought to insist on the words "or welfare" going back in.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I should not object to their reinsertion in this section. I have the highest respect for the opinions of the chairman of the committee. They are well considered, and maybe better than mine upon the subject, but I am unable to perceive that the excision of the two words "or welfare" affects the argument that I am endeavoring to present.

Suppose, for example, in our efforts to supply food products to Great Britain a number of vessels out of proportion to the number now being destroyed which are carrying food should be sunk and we should be face to face with the alternative either of abandoning such attempts to revictual them, notwithstanding the huge food destruction, or of retaining in our own country the remainder for home consumption. Suppose that this home need were so imminent that the mutterings of the public, the discontent of the masses, should indicate revolt and riot should further attempts to replace the food supplies of our allies be made. That would directly menace the public safety; and if the President has not the power to meet such an emergency, then, in my judgment, it is necessary that we should enact this section in order to give him that power.

Now, it may be that we have an abundant food supply. Senators better informed than I so insist. Others having the same information which I possess have expressed their apprehension upon the subject, and, of course, with equal earnestness; and I can readily understand how, in the event the submarine menace is enlarged and aggravated—and I am apprehensive that such a situation will very shortly confront us—what shall we do with regard to the question of domestic food supplies? If the risk, no matter how great, is one which, when compared with the expected profits, does not deter those controlling the food supplies from continuing their efforts to replenish the allies, then greed and avarice, always active and well developed during times of war in every country, will take that risk for the profit which may possible be realized, with consequent depletion of our own food supplies, voicing itself through distress in our great communities.

Under the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, if such an alternative were presented to the President he would be helpless; and if Congress were in recess this menace to safety might develop into open revolt before we could be summoned together to meet the exigency through adequate emergency legislation. So, Mr. President, in my judgment, this section as presented by the committee, if we are to legislate at all upon the subject, should be the one which the Senate should adopt.

Mr. President, I rose, among other things, to call attention to certain comments of the press upon a statement which I made here upon the 2d instant. I am made by the press dispatches to say that I advocate resort to the lamp-post as the proper remedy for correcting the extortionate demands of certain food combinations in this country. I did not say that, Mr. President. I am not surprised that I was so quoted, because nowadays we are liable—and especially those of us who have not been in complete accord with the current demands of the press—to be so represented as to give the public an entirely erroneous impression. It would be a very serious thing for a Senator or Representative, even in these exciting times, to advocate directly an unlawful and violent method of redress for any public wrong. Hence, and for that reason—because I seldom go to the trouble of correcting misstatements in the press concerning myself, since I can not keep up with the procession; I learned that long ago, and therefore abandoned all efforts in that direction—I repeat what I then said:

> There is no question but that such practices are flourishing, and the law seems to be unable to reach or punish them. I greatly fear that unless something is soon done to prevent them, resort will be had to the lamp-post.

Now, I do not indulge the hope that the newspapers which have misquoted me will do me the justice of making the correction; but I can call the attention of some of the people of the country to the truth in this way.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, I expect to cast my vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. I feel that I should offer a word of explanation of my reasons for so doing, lest my vote on questions that may come up in the future may be misunderstood.

I am in favor of the concentration of power during the present war, just as much as it is possible to do so under our Constitution. I shall at all times vote to support the President in any action he may take that I think is within the limits of reason; but I do not believe the time has arrived when the section in the bill is necessary.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia reads:

When during the pending war the President shall find that exports to a particular country are being used to supply an enemy country, and shall make proclamation thereof, it shall be unlawful to export any article or articles from the United States to such country except and under such regulations and orders and subject to such limitations and exceptions as the President shall prescribe, until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress.

It seems to me that this amendment has sufficient scope to answer all present purposes, but I do not believe that present conditions are going to continue. Ere long this Congress will have to do as the bodies of a similar nature in all countries have had to do in the past during great wars, and that is to give power to carry on the war in a forceful and effective manner, either to some one individual or to a small group of individuals designated either by the people or by the governing body. The great trouble in this body attempting to carry on this war by special and specific orders lies in the fact that we would be unable to agree among ourselves. It would take us too long to reach a conclusion, and when that conclusion should be reached it probably would not be any better, or serve the purposes any better, than the conclusion reached by the President, his Cabinet, and his advisers.

I listened yesterday to a very eloquent argument by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and heard him inform this body of the inexperience of some of the present members of the Cabinet. We were advised that the Secretary of War was a young and probably inexperienced attorney from Cleveland, and that there were also thousands and thousands of farmers in the country who knew more about agriculture in their specific lines than our present Secretary of Agriculture. While that may be true to an extent, my judgment is that the President of the United States acted honestly and conscientiously in selecting not only those two men but every other member of his Cabinet.

Even this morning in this body I heard the distinguished Senator from Georgia proclaiming to the world something of his shortcomings as Secretary of the Interior. I listened in silence yesterday relative to the present members of the Cabinet, but I do not propose to-day to listen in silence to that accusation by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] against himself. I appeared before the Senator from Georgia when he was Secretary of the Interior many times on important business connected with a line of work that he had never had experience in handling relative to western irrigation and public-land matters, and I am frank to say that he handled them in a manner which demonstrated that he had surrounded himself with men who had placed him in a position so that he could render an honest, fair decision, and in every case it was beneficial not only to the people of my community, not only to the people of the Western States, but to the Nation at large. I have no hesitation in saying, although he may not think he possessed the ability to do so, that I would not be in the least afraid to-day to trust him in the position we are in this amendment trusting the Secretary of War or the Secretary of Agriculture, and I would feel, as I feel now relative to the matter, that he would perform his services and his duties faithfully and well, and would act in a manner that he thought best for the interests of the whole country.

I wonder if the Senator from Missouri would have appeared on a platform last fall during the time when he so eloquently spoke to some 300,000 people and made the same statements he made yesterday relative to our Secretary of War and Secretary of Agriculture. They were just as good then as now, and he, in his able way, aided by his assistants, made the country understand and convinced them that they were the proper men for the place. I thought otherwise, but under our republican form of government when the battle is over, the decision made, it is the duty of very American citizen to support the administration. For that reason I expect to support the administration and to support the Secretary of War and to support the President of the United States wherever it is possible for me to do so in this awful conflict.

The men in the Cabinet should be selected not to please any particular locality, not to please any particular man, but in order to make the administration of the party in power a success and to serve the people well. There is no election, the President and his advisers act coolly and calmly, and look not for the politician but for the experienced man of affairs who can serve his country in a manner that will enable the President to carry out the pledges and promises he made to the people relative to his conduct of public affairs.

But in this body and in the other branch of the Congress nobody picks the candidate and asks him to come forward and discuss matters that they may see whether or not he is fitted for the position. We select ourselves and go out among the people, and by persuasive oratory and facts try to convince them that we are the proper men for the place, and when we appear in Congress we act with thought of the people at home, with thought of what our constituents will say. As the able Senator from Georgia said this morning, if we were going to put an embargo on corn the Senators from Iowa might object, and I will add, even though it might be for the best interests of this Nation for this embargo to be placed on the exportation of corn. The same question would arise relative to the exportation of cotton, or potatoes, or any other product. So we would never find ourselves in harmony. Before we could take action and agree upon a proper course the war might be won by our enemies.

For that reason, I believe that sooner or later during this war, which I do not believe is going to close nearly so soon as many people believe, it will be necessary for us to confer unlimited powers on our Executive, and it will be necessary for us to do many things that we would not do under normal conditions or in times of peace. But now, while we have the time and the opportunity to study the situation, it seems to me that we are capable of deciding what articles should and what articles should not be exported. I believe that no Senator in this body would vote against a measure that would say that we should not ship things to our foreign enemy. That is what we say in this amendment. It will serve until we get our armies raised or until some condition arises where it becomes necessary for us to put an embargo on other articles. When that time comes I can see no reason why our President and his advisers should not ask permission to put an embargo on any particular article. He can send a message to this body and explain to us why he thinks we should put an embargo on some article, and we will have more time to discuss the matters in proper form and manner than they can possibly have with the very onerous duties that they have to perform.

Therefore, I shall support the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia, but I hope Senators will understand that as matters come up from time to time, as this war progresses and while we are facing the enemy, it shall be my purpose, when I can conscientiously do so, at all times to support the President in the things that he believes are best for the interests of the people of this country and the winning of the war.

It is well known that I voted and worked against the present occupant of the White House. I favored another man because he represented my party and the principles that my party stands for. I had a feeling of regret when I read in the morning papers after the election that the man whom I had opposed had been elected. But I never felt more proud of anything in my life than I did after the declaration of war was made to have the man whom I supported and whom I wanted in the White House come out in the very first issue of the paper and say he was for standing behind the President and asked all his friends to do likewise. That is Americanism, and that is the kind of Americanism that will win this war.

I hope that the war may be ended soon, but I realize that the President is the Commander in Chief of our Army and he is fighting for our country, fighting for our flag, and he, with us, is fighting for a world democracy and a lasting and permanent peace; and while he is doing that he is fighting for my country and my flag, and I expect to stand by him in every move that he makes that is for the benefit of the people of this country so long as I can do so and observe the oath of office that I have taken.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President, I do not know who recommended this amendment to section 1 of the chapter of the bill before us, and that does not concern me very much, but I am going to vote for that amendment for the reason that I find contained in the first 17 words of that amendment the following:

Whenever the United States is at war and the President shall find that public safety shall so require.

Mr. President, I realize as well as anybody here that the President of the United States is loaded down with powers given by Congress. I have no doubt but that he would much rather not stand in that position with regard to about three-fourths of those powers. But the provision contained in this amendment seems to me to be one of the most important provisions relative to any power I know of that is to be conferred upon him by Congress.

Mr. President, if this embargo is placed upon food stuffs there is no State in the Union which will be affected greater than my own, and I will have to answer to my constituency if I cast my vote on this matter contrary to their views; but I know, I am certain, that they will all uphold my views and my vote upon this question of so grave importance to our country—should the emergency arise that would require it—as provided in this amendment.

I do not care to take up any time of the Senate and will not do so, but I shall vote for this amendment believing it to be the most important amendment that is contained in the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a very few minutes. A great deal has been said in this discussion with reference to whether this bill comes from the President or from the Department of Justice with his approval. I myself do not know anything about that, but I am sure if the bill was prepared by the Department of Justice and sent to the committee it was prepared after mature deliberation and was presented to the committee only after it had received the sanction of the President; and I am equally sure that it did not receive the sanction of the President until after he himself had given it mature and earnest consideration. I am sure of that because of the importance of the power that is sought to be conferred upon the President. I do not know whether this bill is the result of the deliberations of the committee, acting upon its own initiative, or whether it comes from the President through the Department of Justice, but I know enough of the President and the Attorney General to say with implicit confidence that if it came from the Department of Justice it came with the sanction of the President and that the President maturely considered it before he sanctioned it.

But, Mr. President, I do not care whether the bill is the result of the initiative of the administration or the committee; I do not care whether the President is asking this authority or not, because I believe, whether he asks it or not, he ought to have it and that the interests and the public safety of the country require that it should be bestowed upon him.

What is the power that is proposed to be conferred upon the President? It is not the power to proclaim an embargo simply because in his judgment the public welfare requires it. That provision has been eliminated from the bill. The power of embargo the bill proposes to confer upon the President is confined to cases where the public safety is involved, where the safety of the Nation requires that the prohibition should be declared and enforced.

Senators say that that is a power which the people lodged in Congress. It is very true that it is a power which the people lodged in Congress, and if it were absolutely certain that Congress was going to remain in continuous session during the continuance of this horrible war, ready at any time when an emergency arises to exercise the power in the interest of the public safety there would be something in the argument against delegating the power to the President.

But, Mr. President, we know that Congress is not going to continue in session during the whole of the time of the probable continuance of this war. What is going to happen if Congress shall adjourn and go home leaving no one with the power to protect the Government in this matter involving, it may be, not only the safety, but the very life of the Nation?

Mr. President, I do not know what might happen in such a situation, but that Congress should deliberately leave the Government without means to protect the country against such a jeopardy is to me wholly inconceivable.

Mr. President, it is sought to sustain the opposition to conferring upon the President this vital power, a power that we have every reason to know will be discreetly exercised, upon the theory that the foreign markets of farmers are threatened. We are not acting upon a bill now to place an embargo upon food products. The bill we are considering does not authorize the President, in case the public welfare or the domestic requirements call for an embargo upon the exportation of food products or any other kind of products, to place one upon them. We are not considering that sort of bill. We are considering a bill to authorize him to impose the embargo only when in his judgment, as the Chief Executive of the Nation, as the Commander in Chief of the Army, as the man whom we have intrusted to carry on this war, he thinks "the public safety"—those are the words used in the grant of power—requires it.

I know the farmers do not want an embargo placed upon their food products, but do you not know, Mr. President, and does not every Senator here know, that the farmers of this country understand perfectly well that an embargo upon food products, except possibly to a few small so-called neutral countries bordering upon the country of the enemy, would not be an embargo in the public interest and safety, but would be an embargo against the public interest and safety? Are we not being constantly and insistently admonished and warned that it is absolutely necessary we shall send food products in increasing quantities to our allies? Without our help in this respect they can not win the war for us and for themselves.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRADY in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SIMMONS. I beg the Senator not to interrupt me just at this point. As a matter of "safety" to us, therefore, it is just as important that the allies should have foodstuffs and munitions and the other necessary supplies of war as it is that they shall have soldiers. It is just as unreasonable to believe the President in these circumstances would proclaim an embargo upon food products destined for our allies as it would be to believe he would proclaim an embargo upon an army being sent to Europe to aid our allies in case it shall become necessary to do so to save us and them from crushing defeat. The farmers understand that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator let me ask him what kind of an embargo he thinks will be necessary and why he thinks this power should be given to the President?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am not now discussing the question of what kind of an embargo should be placed; I am discussing the question whether there is any justification for this attempt to alarm the farmers of the country with the suggestion that by giving the President the power to declare an embargo when he thinks the public safety requires it, is a menace of their foreign markets for the sale of their products.

Mr. President, the farmers are not alarmed about this. Let me say to Senators that I do not believe there are any farmers in this country—there are not in my part of the country, I say with confidence—who want to deny to the President the right to place an embargo upon their products if it should be found after investigation that the exportation of those products jeopardizes the public safety of the Nation. To say that they want the foreign markets for their products at the expense of the safety of the country is to question their patriotism.

I am not afraid that any farmer in my State, I am not afraid that any manufacturer in my State will say, "I am outraged in my rights because, forsooth, the Congress of the United States has said that the President may prohibit exportations of my products when during this war the 'safety' of the country in his judgment require it." No; he will take no such unpatriotic position. On the other hand, he will say, "I am willing to forego my profit and willing to sustain the loss if it be necessary to preserve the Nation's life or safety." The patriotism that does not rise to that level, Mr. President, is not patriotism at all; it is selfish commercialism masquerading in the garb of patriotism.

Mr. President, it is said that Congress alone has the power of embargo. Yes; and they got it from the people. The people gave that right to Congress and are not afraid it will abuse it either in times of peace or time of war; neither are they afraid that the President of the United States will abuse it if it is delegated to him by Congress. Senators upon this floor have fallen into the habit of constantly going into hysterics over any suggestion of the delegation of power, even though it be a war power, to the President. They tremble lest we pave the way to autocracy.

Mr. President, I want to say in conclusion that such distrust of the President of the United States meets no response in the public mind. Distrust his patriotism? No. Distrust his sincerity of purpose and disinterestedness of action? No. Distrust his judgment or ability to determine wisely and patriotically what is for the best interests of this country? No. The people of this country have confidence in Congress, but they have equal confidence in the man who sits in the White House as the chosen guardian of their interests and the public weal as they have in Congress; and no Senator need refuse to vote to confer this power on the President upon the theory that it will be unpopular with his constituents. Let no Senator deceive himself with the belief that the people distrust the President or fear he will, if given the power, betray their confidence by abusing it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. CALDER obtained the floor.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. WALSH. I do not want to take the Senator off the floor. I did not know the Senator had the floor.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, we have heard discussed at length this afternoon the question of enacting legislation permitting the President to levy an embargo against exports to any countries.

It seems to me that it might be well to inform the Senate that for the past year at least there has been in effect a system in this country which has prevented the shipment of goods to any neutral country in Europe whereby the goods could in any way reach the central powers. The practice has been that before any ship left the eastern coast of the United States the shipper has been compelled to secure a letter of assurance from the trade department of the British Embassy, which letter is issued only after the British foreign office has investigated the consignee and through the local British consul secured satisfactory guaranties, backed by indemnities, that the goods he desires to import will not be reexported in any shape whatsoever to any of the powers allied against Great Britain.

The control exercised by Great Britain through the issuance of these letters of assurance has restricted the quantities of commodities shipped to neutral European countries to the barest amount of actual consumption. Through the necessity of steamers carrying cargoes to northern Europe being compelled to call at Halifax and those sailing for ports in southern Europe being compelled to stop at Gibraltar, where manifests and letters of assurance are carefully scrutinized, there is no possibility of the shipper fictitiously describing his shipment with the idea of violating any of the principles involved in Great Britain's control of this system.

It is true, Mr. President, that our shipments to neutral countries in Europe, particularly those in close proximity to Germany, have of late largely increased. I have not the figures before me; but I venture the statement that our exports to Norway, Sweden, Denmark, and Holland are many times what they were before the war. I have talked to some of the people engaged in this shipping business, and they have explained that this is accounted for by the fact that these countries are able to secure little or nothing from Russia, Germany, France, or Great Britain; that these markets are practically closed to them. They must therefore obtain from the United States nearly all of the things needed for their own consumption. A man interested in shipping to Norway advises me that that country is compelled to import at least 50 per cent of the foodstuffs that she consumes.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CALDER. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to say to the Senator from New York that Norway has to import fully three-fifths of all the cereals that she needs. Before the war Norway used a good deal of rye, and got most of her grain from Russia and the Baltic Provinces of Prussia. Since the war all that supply has been cut off, and the people of Norway have to get all their flour, their corn, and other grain, as well as most all of the products they consume, from this country. Norway had a great trade with Germany previously to the war, but that has been cut off. As the Senator well states, her trade has also been cut off to a large extent with England. The same is true as to Denmark and Sweden, but not to so great an extent with respect to cereals as to other products.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, the Senator confirms what I said a moment ago. The statement, continually made, that our exports to the northern European countries are getting into Germany can hardly be borne out by the facts, particularly when one comes to understand the very careful supervision that England has exercised over all exports from the United States, at least during the past year. If we prohibit trade with the countries of northern Europe, we will not only seriously hamper the business of many legitimate enterprises here in our own country, but our action will tend to create bitterness on the part of the people of those nations that is not warranted under the circumstances.

For my part, I feel disposed to support the amendment submitted by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. I should like very much to have it broadened to help the conditions referred to by the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD], and I hope that some provision may be made to take care of the difficulty regarding tin plate; but if we give to the President the right to levy an embargo against the export of foodstuffs, which might ultimately reach countries at war with the United States, and stop at that, it seems to me, Mr. President, we shall go quite far enough.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, before the substitute is voted upon, I suppose the original text should be perfected. I inquire whether the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota—the incorporation of a provision to the effect that the orders and regulations shall not give the ports of one State preference over those of another——

Mr. OVERMAN. That amendment has been adopted.

Mr. NELSON. That was adopted last night.

Mr. WALSH. It has been agreed to?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Will the Secretary read the provision as it now stands?

Mr. OVERMAN. I think, before it is voted upon, we had better have a full Senate, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. WALSH. Will the Senator from North Carolina withhold that suggestion until I can have the section read?

Mr. OVERMAN. I was going to ask to have it read to a full Senate.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, I simply want to state that if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia shall be adopted I shall introduce an amendment covering the tin-plate situation, which I trust may be acceptable to the Senate, as I think it will be entirely so to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. OVERMAN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gronna	McKellar	Smith, Ga.
Bankhead	Hale	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Brady	Hardwick	New	Smoot
Calder	Hitchcock	Norris	Sterling
Chamberlain	Hollis	Overman	Stone
Colt	Husting	Page	Sutherland
Culberson	Johnson, Cal.	Phelan	Thomas
Curtis	Johnson, S. Dak.	Pomerene	Thompson
Dillingham	Jones, N. Mex.	Ransdell	Trammell
Fall	Jones, Wash.	Reed	Underwood
Fernald	Kendrick	Saulsbury	Vardaman
Fletcher	King	Shafroth	Wadsworth
France	Kirby	Sheppard	Walsh
Gallinger	Knox	Sherman	Warren
Gerry	Lewis	Shields	Watson
Gore	McCumber	Simmons	Wolcott

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], on account of illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the absence of the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], who is detained from the Senate on account of illness in his family. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] is necessarily absent from the Senate on official business.

Mr. THOMPSON. I am requested to announce that the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] is detained from the Chamber on account of illness.

Mr. KIRBY. I wish to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], is absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to take just one minute to clear up a matter that occurred this morning. The statement had been made, in substance, that information had been furnished by the President to the Judiciary Committee that goods or provisions being shipped from this country were being sent either to enemy countries or were being sent to neutral countries, which in turn forwarded the goods to enemy countries. Some colloquy and discussion occurred about that, when the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] sent for a letter of the President, and it was read at the desk as bearing out the statement. I have had occasion to examine the letter, and I find that it does not convey any such information. The President's statement was:

> I am taking the liberty of sending you the draft of a suggested bill permitting the President to control exports for the purpose of seeing to it that the resources of the country are used in the most effective way for the prosecution of the present war rather than diverted to countries or quarters where they are less needed.

That is a very different proposition from one which might have conveyed to us information that goods were being sent to enemy countries.

I simply make this statement in order to clear up the record, that there may be no misunderstanding. I was very sure that the information had never been given to the committee while I was present that goods were being sent from this country to enemy countries or to neutrals and by them sent on to enemy countries to the injury of the United States.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. WALSH. I think that the inquiry which gave rise to the presentation of the letter was as to whether this particular bill was sent by the President and approved by him. I do not recall that any question was presented as to the validity of the reasons which he urged for the passage of the bill.

Mr. REED. Both the question referred to by the Senator from Montana and the one to which I have just referred were made matters of discussion, and I simply wanted to say the word which I have said not for the purpose of criticizing the Senator from Montana for producing the letter or for the purpose of criticizing anybody else, but simply to clear the question up.

Now, Mr. President, that brings me to one further observation, and then I shall take my seat. I am unwilling that the Senator in charge of this bill should be permitted to criticize the members of the Judiciary Committee who may now see fit to oppose certain provisions of the bill or to ask their amendment. To begin with, while this bill was some considerable time before the Judiciary Committee, the Senator knows that many other important matters were constantly pressed upon that committee for attention, and that our examination of all bills for some time, because of the congestion of work in the committee, was lacking to some extent in that deliberation which we usually undertake to bring to the consideration of any important bill. He also will recognize the fact that the same emergency which occasioned the unusual demands upon the Judiciary Committee also occasioned demands upon other committees, which compelled Senators frequently to leave the Judiciary Committee to attend other committees. A fitting illustration of that I can give from my personal experience. A portion of the time that the particular bill now under consideration was before the Judiciary Committee I was compelled to choose between attending the Judiciary Committee and attending the Committee on Military Affairs, the Committee on Military Affairs having under consideration bills which related to the organization of the Army, the immediate passage of which, it was asserted, was absolutely necessary. Likewise, the Committee on Banking and Currency was called together to pass upon emergency financial legislation, and it was necessary at times to attend upon that committee. So that we did not have the opportunity to give to the pending bill as full and complete discussion as it would have received under normal circumstances.

Moreover, it was pretty well understood that any member of the committee was at perfect liberty to suggest amendments or changes as they occurred to him upon the floor. But, however that may be, I affirm this to be true, that it is the high duty of any Member of the Senate who has sat upon a committee to change his position in the Senate if he is convinced by the arguments in the Senate that the report of the committee is wrong; and, if it be true that a number of Senators on the committee have changed their opinion, the argument is only that much stronger in favor of a modification of the language of the bill.

Mr. FERNALD Mr. President——.

Mr. REED. I will yield to the Senator presently; I shall be through in a moment.

Mr. FERNALD. Very well.

Mr. REED. One further observation, and I shall take my seat. I am unwilling that the distinguished Senator in charge of this bill, for whom I entertain a genuine affection and a very high respect and regard, should assume the attitude that those who believe the language of the bill is not just what it ought to be are opposed to giving the President all the power that he ought to have; that they are standing in opposition to the President; that they are seeking to tie the President's hands. Mr. President, if I did not so love the Senator from North Carolina, if I were speaking of and concerning some man to whom I was indifferent, I would say that that was rather a cheap kind of pettifogging, but I would not say that of the Senator from North Carolina for anything in the world, because I know he is incapable of it.

All these matters ought to be settled upon their merits. Let us start with this basic fact, that there is not a man in this body who is not a patriotic American citizen; that there is not a man in this body who does not place the interests of America above every other consideration in the world; that there is not a man in this body who is not in heart and in soul as much devoted to his country as is any member of the Cabinet, or as is even the President of the United States himself. A great problem confronts us, the greatest problem that has ever confronted this Nation. We all have our duties to perform; we all want to solve that problem right; and some of us see the matter in one light and some of us see it in another light. Some believe that we should create an absolute dictatorship in the United States, and they stand and cry aloud against all who do not agree; but some believe that all power necessary can be conferred and yet every principle of the Constitution can be preserved; that all power necessary can be conferred and the business of the United States not be given any violent wrench. So these Senators, all equally sincere, all equally desiring the success of our country, have divergent views; and it is not in comport with what I think is the highest duty of Senators to undertake to impugn the motives of any fellow Senator because he does not agree to a particular bill that was handed to us by the Attorney General.

Why, Mr. President, the Attorney General himself, if he were a Member of this body, would not decline to consider suggestions. He brought to us a number of bills. The Senator from North Carolina has spoken with reference to them. These bills were before the Senate and were modified not only in committee but upon the floor of the Senate in many important respects; and yet when the Attorney General brought them back at a subsequent session he adopted practically the bills as they had been amended by the Senate, thus conceding, at least, that he did not desire to antagonize the Senate; perhaps conceding that the Senate had added a little of wisdom to the bill.

The particular measure now under discussion, after being discussed for days, was found to need an amendment, even according to the opinion of the distinguished Senator in charge of the bill, for he accepted a most important amendment—an amendment which, in my judgment, changes the whole character of the bill, because the language as it stood gave the President the authority, whenever the United States is at war and the President shall find that the public welfare so requires, to close the ports of the United States to every foreign country or to any foreign country. Thus the President would have had conferred upon him if the bill had passed a right at any time during a war to close the ports of the country for any reason which the President in his judgment thought might be for the public welfare. The chairman of the committee has consented to striking out those words—a most important amendment—leaving the bill to stand so that the President shall possess this authority only in case he shall find that the public safety shall require the placing of an embargo.

I make this statement because I think, with all the kindness in the world, that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], in the fervor of his eloquence this morning, came very near criticizing the motives of all who have ventured to differ from him somewhat with reference to this bill. I think this much ought to be said in the interest of fairness.

Now, Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I apologize for the time of the Senate I have taken in discussing this bill. I hope I shall not take so much for a long time in the future.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the pending amendment of the Senator from Georgia. I send the amendment to the desk and ask to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of the words proposed to be inserted, the following:

Whenever during the pending war the President shall find that the exportation of tin plate or tin containers to any foreign country will leave the United States without an adequate supply for the manufacture of tin containers, and shall make proclamation thereof, it shall be unlawful to export such tin pate or tin containers to such countries from the United States, except at such times and under such regulations and orders and subject to such limitations and exceptions as the President shall prescribe, until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I want to say to my distinguished friend from Maine that that amendment is out of order at this time, being an amendment in the third degree. If the amendment of the Senator from Georgia is adopted, then the Senator can offer his amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is clearly in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is an amendment in the third degree. The chapter is an amendment to the original bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is an amendment to the pending amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President if the amendment which I have offered is adopted, and the Senator from Maine will offer this as an additional section, I should think it would be entirely in order, and I certainly should not object to it.

Mr. OVERMAN. This amendment is not in order now.

Mr. FERNALD. I understand that it is in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is an amendment in the third degree.

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; not as I understand it, Mr. President. The provision to be amended is the committee bill. The amendment is offered by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. OVERMAN. Chapter 7 itself is a committee amendment, and the Senator from Georgia has offered an amendment to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute. Chapter VII is not in the original bill, so the committee offers it as an amendment.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Is it not true that the provision in the Senate bill in italics is a part of the original bill as presented to the Senate?

Mr. OVERMAN. Not at all. I tried to explain this morning that we introduced in the Senate a bill containing certain chapters that were in the bill which passed the Senate. After the introduction of that bill, when it went to the committee, the committee reported Chapter VII as a committee amendment to the original bill, so that is an amendment to this bill. Then the Senator from Georgia introduced an amendment—that makes the second amendment—and this is the third amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The understanding of the Chair is that the amendment of the Senator from Georgia is to strike out and insert. Rule XVIII, in closing, says:

> But pending a motion to strike out and insert, the part to be stricken out and the part to be inserted shall each be regarded for the purpose of amendment as a question; and motions to amend the part to be stricken out shall have precedence.

Mr. OVERMAN. I misunderstood the amendment. I thought it was an amendment to the chapter—a motion to strike out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not. It is a motion to strike out and insert.

BUREAU OF WAR-RISK INSURANCE.

Mr. SIMMONS. Out of order, I ask unanimous consent to report favorably with amendments from the Finance Committee Senate bill 2133, known as the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance bill, and I submit a report (No. 33) thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to make a report from the Committee on Finance. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the report will be received.

Mr. SMOOT. Do I understand the Senator to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill, or merely to report it?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I asked unanimous consent to make a report from the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to that, but I should object to the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. THOMPSON. I ask unanimous consent to report favorably, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, Senate resolution 53, with regard to the employment of a stenographer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent to submit a report. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. THOMPSON. I should like unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate resolution 53.

Mr. OVERMAN. I can not agree to unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution. I have no objection to the Senator submitting the report, but I must decline to allow it to be considered at this time, while the pending bill is being considered.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from North Carolina that there can be no objection whatever to the resolution, and it can be passed in a moment.

Mr. THOMPSON. I can not see what objection there can be. It is for the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. OVERMAN. If I should give unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution, I would have to give it for others, and therefore I am obliged to object. It can be taken up when the calendar is considered. I know all about what is needed; and it can be taken up from the calendar at any time.

Mr. THOMPSON. Of course, if the acting chairman of the Judiciary Committee does not want the resolution passed, I shall not press it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not desire it to be passed while the pending bill is under consideration. I can not consent to have a resolution passed involving my own committee and then object to another committee having a similar resolution passed. I wish to be consistent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will go to the calendar.

PUNISHMENT OF ESPIONAGE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2) to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, this debate has been so protracted that until the last moment I had concluded not to say anything upon this subject; but certain doctrines have been announced here that seem to me to be utterly subversive of the best interests, indeed, of the life and the welfare of the country. Before coming to the main point, however, I desire to call attention to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH].

That amendment, Mr. President, is wholly unnecessary. The President can exercise that power. It is exactly the same power that the British Government has exercised in respect to the blockade of Germany. In connection with that blockade, the British Government has established and maintained the doctrine that it had a right to seize goods that were destined for the enemy's country, even though they passed through a neutral country. All that the amendment of the Senator from Georgia proposes to do is simply to prohibit the export of our products through a neutral country to an enemy's country. Now, all we have to do to accomplish that fact is to join with the British Government is maintaining the blockade that Great Britain has maintained, to join with her, and insist upon the doctrine that Great Britain has insisted upon, and that is that the ultimate destination of the goods is the criterion. So that, to my mind, the amendment of the Senator from Georgia is utterly useless and unnecessary. The President, by means of the blockade that I have suggested, can exercise all the powers that that amendment undertakes to give him.

Coming back to the main question, Mr. President, I listened with much interest yesterday to that part of the argument of the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] in which he denied our constitutional power to enact this legislation. I concede that there may be an honest difference of opinion between us as to whether or not this is wise legislation under existing circumstances, but to me there is not a scintilla of doubt that the Government has a perfect right, in the midst of this great war, to enact such legislation, and I will tell you why: Congress has declared war. Having declared war, it is our duty and we are empowered under the Constitution to provide for the national defense. This war is what military men call an offensive-defensive. It is as much a part of our national defense to see that our people, our soldiers, and our sailors have an abundance of food during the war as it is to equip them with swords and bayonets and with powder and shells.

Suppose it turns out next fall that our crop has been such a failure that we really need all our agricultural products for our people here at home and for our Army and Navy. You and I know that we have in this country some men so possessed of the spirit of Mammon and the spirit of the very devil that wherever they can see a chance to make a dollar they will make it, they care not at whose expense, whether at their neighbor's expense or at the expense of their own country. If those speculators, in case of such an emergency as I have cited, should see that they could get more for their products by shipping them to one of the neutral countries in South America than by selling them to our own Government, they would never hesitate to do so, even if our soldiers and sailors and our people at home needed every pound of those products.

Can Senators draw any distinction between the necessity of providing our own people and our Army and Navy with an ample supply of food, and the matter of supplying them with ammunition and all those things that are essential in war? To deny the Government this right and power would be to divest it of one of its original functions and sources of strength. When we are in the midst of a great war, as we are on this occasion, we have a right to arm and equip our Government in such a manner that it will be ready for every emergency, small or great.

Mr. President, I have been a Republican all my life, but since we have declared war I have buried all partisan feelings. I am for this country always, whether in war or in peace. I am ready to smoke the pipe of peace in peace; but when we are at war I want to wield the tomahawks of war to the uttermost, and I have said, and I repeat it, to my mind it is as important that we equip our Government by providing for an ample supply of food of all kinds as it is to provide for munitions and all the implements of warfare.

But it is said, "Oh, there is great danger in committing this power to the President." Well, he was not the President of my choice, but he is at the head of this Government; he has charge of it; we are in the midst of a gigantic war, and I am willing to trust him. We have already conferred on the administration great powers—the distribution of a $7,000,000,000 fund—and the other day the Senator from Georgia was willing to intrust to the President the buying of $10,000,000 worth of nitrate of soda, distributing it to the people who needed it, and collecting the proceeds as best he could. I sympathized with him in that case; I thought he was straining things a little; but I knew that the people of the South needed those fertilizers—thank God, we in the West and Northwest do not need them—so I was willing to have him stretch things in that instance.

During the Spanish-American War we laid an embargo on the exportation of coal and one or two other products with respect to which we thought it was necessary. Now, we do not know what the morrow may bring forth. If Congress were to remain in perpetual session—and for the good of the country I hope it will not—and could act quickly, we might leave this power in abeyance, but Congress is not likely to be in session perpetually. Suppose next fall we have a shortage of food products; suppose that in many lines of industry there is a shortage, and that we ought to keep our products at home, ought we not to put up a bar against these greedy cormorants who are ready to do anything to make an extra dollar, no matter whether it injures their own country or not?

To me—and I can not help but say it in dead earnest; as my friends here know, I never mince matters—this doctrine that the Constitution makes us helpless in such cases, and that we have no power in the case of a war emergency, is utterly repulsive. I can very well see, as I said at the outset, how men can differ as to the necessity for this legislation. That is a thing on which men may fairly differ; but I do not understand how any man who has at heart the welfare, the honor, aye, the very existence of our Government in the midst of a great war—and they tell us this war will last two years and longer, and that it will try all our resources in men and money—I do not understand how any patriot can have the heart to say that the Constitution does not give our Government this power. To my mind in time of war, as a matter of national defense, our Government has this power as clearly as it has the power to organize and equip armies and send them into the field.

The President is given a great many powers by legislation. That right is denied here, and it is said that you can not delegate legislative powers. We have repeatedly done it. We confer great legislative powers upon the Interstate Commerce Commission. We authorize them to establish and fix reasonable rates; but, Mr. President, no act of Congress has ever defined, and no act of Congress ever can define, what is "a reasonable rate." That is left to the judgment of the Interstate Commerce Commission, followed by the judgments of the courts where a case is taken into the judicial tribunals. I remember some years ago we provided for a system of tea inspection, and delegated certain powers in that connection. That law was passed upon by the Supreme Court. I forget the title of the case, but some of the lawyers here whose memories are better than mine can perhaps tell me what it was.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Stranahan case.

Mr. NELSON. Yes; the Stranahan case. In that case the question was raised that we had sought to confer legislative power upon an administrative officer in respect to the grading of imported teas. The Supreme Court held the act to be valid, and said that we had a right to confer legislative power.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. NELSON. I do.

Mr. OVERMAN. Certainly the Senator was here, I think—I know he has been here longer than I have been, and I was here then—when many of the lawyers took the position that we could not delegate to the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to regulate rates.

Mr. NELSON. Oh, I have heard that old argument year after year, that we never could delegate that power. If time permitted, I could enumerate many instances where we have delegated it. In the very nature of things in many instances we must delegate it. How could Congress in every instance pass upon the question of what were reasonable or unreasonable rates? And so, how could Congress readily determine the question whether there was a scarcity of food or of any other product in this country, necessitating and requiring an embargo?

My friends, let us not take too narrow a view of this question. Let us arm and equip the Government with the power to exert all its resources in every direction, so as to bring to a victorious conclusion this great war. To me, Mr. President, it has seemed from the beginning that this was a war in which our own country was vitally interested. To me it seemed that if Germany, Austria, and Turkey should succeed in this great war, should vanquish France, England, and Russia, our country would be absolutely at the mercy of those autocratic Governments. So from the beginning I have cared little about orders in council, about blockades, and about keeping the ocean lanes open. I have looked at the big question beyond. That was the great question, that France, England, and Russia were fighting—at a long distance from us, to be sure, but nevertheless fighting—the battle of real democracy throughout the world. Now that we have joined in this great war, let us not be small; let us not distrust our own Government; let us generously equip it with all the power that is needed, in order that success may crown our efforts and that democracy may become the paramount and prevailing system of government of the entire civilized world.

I am unwilling to go into details, and discuss this subject from A to Z in all its minutiæ, to assume that there is danger here and danger there, a shadow here and another shadow there, and that all our officials in high authority—the President and whomsoever he calls into his councils—are likely to be corrupt, are likely to be dishonest, or are likely to do something unusual and dangerous to the country and its institutions. Why, Mr. President, we are all human; we are all liable to make mistakes; but I assume, and I think all Senators ought to assume, that these public officials, from the President down, are as honest and have as good intentions as we have. I am willing to trust them, though they are not of my own party. I am willing to trust them because this is a great emergency, and I want our country so equipped that we will emerge from this almost world-wide conflict with victory emblazoned on our banners, with every assurance for a long-continued and unbroken peace, and with our free, republican institutions unimpaired.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. THOMAS. I suggest the absence of a quorum. The Senator from Georgia is absent at this moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gronna	McKellar	Shields
Bankhead	Hale	Martin	Simmons
Borah	Hardwick	Myers	Smith, Ga.
Brady	Hitchcock	Nelson	Smoot
Calder	Hollis	New	Sterling
Chamberlain	Husting	Norris	Sutherland
Colt	Johnson, Cal.	Overman	Thomas
Culberson	Johnson, S. Dak.	Page	Thompson
Cummins	Jones, N. Mex.	Phelan	Townsend
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Poindexter	Underwood
Dillingham	Kendrick	Pomerene	Vardaman
Fall	Kenyon	Ransdell	Walsh
Fernald	King	Reed	Warren
Fletcher	Kirby	Saulsbury	Watson
France	Knox	Shafroth	Wolcott
Gallinger	La Follette	Sheppard
Gerry	McCumber	Sherman

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] is absent from the Senate on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to add, after the word "used," in the sixth line of the substitute which I have offered, the words "directly or indirectly," so that it will read:

exports to a particular country are being used directly or indirectly to supply an enemy country.

That broader language will cover it if they are shipping out their own goods and bringing other goods in to take the place of their goods.

I wish the Senator from Maine would let it be just as straight as it is now, without proposing to put anything else on it. I am just afraid that the substitute would be jeopardized by his amendment. He could offer his proposed amendment as an independent section, and we could vote upon it then as an independent section. I am for it as an independent section, but if he offers it as an amendment to the substitute there will not be a chance to get a clean-cut issue between the original provision reported by the Senate committee report and this substitute.

Mr. SMOOT. I also suggest to the Senator from Georgia that the Senator from Maine could offer his amendment after the bill gets into the Senate. He can reserve the right to offer it in the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If necessary, I can reach the same object that I have by simply moving three amendments to the original provision. I can move that the first line of section 1 be stricken out, which uses the language, "Whenever the United States is at war and," and substitute therefor "When during the pending war"; I can move to strike out, in the fifth line, "the public safety shall so require" and substitute "exports to a particular country are being used, directly or indirectly, to supply an enemy country"; I can move to strike out "except at such time or times" and add the words "to such country except"; and then I would have the exact language of the substitute I offer.

So, if the Senator from Maine forces me to do so, I can go back to the original provision in the bill reported and by three amendments bring in the substitute. I believe it is better for us to have an opportunity to just vote the substitute against the original provision and let the special provision with reference to the particular industry come up on its own merits.

Mr. FERNALD. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment and will offer it again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question, then, is on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. THOMAS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN's name was called). I desire to announce the absence of the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] on account of illness in his family. He is paired with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], with whom I am paired, is absent. I do not know how the Senator from Connecticut would vote if present. I transfer my pair to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], which I transfer to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] and that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] is paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. KIRBY. I have been requested to announce that my colleague [Mr. ROBINSON] is detained on official business. He is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN].

Mr. REED (after having voted in the affirmative). I voted without announcing a transfer. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have a general pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE]. Understanding that he would vote the same way that I will if he were present, I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and let my vote stand.

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] is detained from the Chamber on account of illness. He stands paired on this vote with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN].

Mr. SIMMONS (after having voted in the negative). I wish to inquire whether the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. SIMMONS. I transfer my pair with that Senator to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and let my vote stand.

Mr. WEEKS. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], which I transfer to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING. I have a pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to state to the Senator from South Dakota that if the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING. I am therefore at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (after having voted in the affirmative). I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and let my vote stand.

The result was announced—yeas 40, nays 30, as follows:

YEAS—40.

Bankhead	France	McKellar	Smith, Ga.
Borah	Gallinger	Martin	Smoot
Brady	Gore	New	Sterling
Calder	Hale	Norris	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Hardwick	Page	Townsend
Cummins	Hitchcock	Poindexter	Underwood
Curtis	Johnson, Cal.	Reed	Vardaman
Dillingham	Kenyon	Shafroth	Wadsworth
Fall	Knox	Sherman	Watson
Fernald	Lewis	Shields	Weeks

NAYS—30.

Ashurst	Husting	McCumber	Sheppard
Beckham	Johnson, S. Dak.	Myers	Simmons
Colt	Jones, N. Mex.	Nelson	Thomas
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Thompson
Fletcher	Kendrick	Phelan	Walsh
Gerry	King	Pomerene	Wolcott
Gronna	Kirby	Ransdell
Hollis	La Follette	Saulsbury

NOT VOTING—26.

Brandegee	Kellogg	Pittman	Swanson
Broussard	Lane	Robinson	Tillman
Frelinghuysen	Lodge	Smith, Ariz.	Trammell
Goff	McLean	Smith, Md.	Warren
Harding	Newlands	Smith, Mich.	Williams
Hughes	Owen	Smith, S. C.
James	Penrose	Stone

So the amendment of Mr. SMITH of Georgia was agreed to.

Mr. KING. I send to the desk a substitute for section 1 of Chapter VII, which has just been adopted, and ask that it be read.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the matter just inserted it is proposed to insert the following——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I make the point of order that that is not in order until the bill reaches the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. FERNALD. I offer the amendment which I withdrew as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia. I offer it at this time as a separate section.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. The bill was referred to the Judiciary Committee, which reported Chapter VII with amendments. The Senator from Georgia then moved to substitute a section prepared by him for the amendments proposed by the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. And that was adopted.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] was desirous of taking the judgment of the Senate upon the wisdom of adopting the substitute proposed by him rather than the substitute offered by the Senator from Georgia, both of them being substitutes for section 1 as proposed by the committee. The Senator from Utah inquired of some of us as to whether under the rules of the Senate he would be entitled to move his amendment as a substitute for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia. I may have spoken ill advisedly to him, but I advised the Senator that it would not be in order. If it was not in order, it does seem to me as though there should be some method of presenting to the Senate in Committee of the Whole the substitute proposed by the Senator from Utah rather than the substitute proposed by the Senator from Georgia. I inquire of the Chair what course the Senator from Utah may take in order to test the sense of the Senate upon his proposed substitute.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What course he may take, the Chair is not prepared to rule upon. What course he could have taken would have been to offer it at the time either to the part proposed to be stricken out or the part proposed to be inserted; but he did not offer it to either.

Mr. WALSH. He offers it now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. But he offers it after the part proposed by the committee has been stricken out and the part proposed by the Senator from Georgia has been inserted.

Mr. WALSH. Let me remark that there could not be two motions pending at one and the same time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The rule says:

> If the question in debate contains several propositions, any Senator may have the same divided, except a motion to strike out and insert, which shall not be divided; but the rejection of a motion to strike out and insert one proposition shall not prevent a motion to strike out and insert a different proposition; nor shall it prevent a motion simply to strike out; nor shall the rejection of a motion to strike out prevent a motion to strike out and insert.

That seems to cover all those questions.

> But pending a motion to strike out and insert, the part to be stricken out and the part to be inserted shall be regarded for the purpose of amendment as a question; and motions to amend the part to be stricken out shall have precedence.

This is the first time the Chair has ever heard it questioned that the Senator from Utah did not have the distinct right either to offer his amendment to the original committee amendment or to the proposed amendment of the Senator from Georgia. Not having offered it to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia and that amendment having been adopted, the Chair holds that in Committee of the Whole it is now too late to present it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. In order to get the matter before the Senate I will move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia was adopted.

Mr. KING. I think the matter can be properly presented to the Senate in the Senate, and I ask leave to withdraw my amendment now. I shall offer it at an appropriate time when the bill is under consideration in the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine offers as a separate section an amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. Add, after section 1 of chapter 7, a new section, as follows:

SEC. 2. Whenever during the pending war the President shall find that the exportation of tin plate or tin containers to any foreign country will leave the United States without an adequate supply for the manufacture of tin containers and shall make proclamation thereof, it shall be unlawful to export such tin plate or tin containers to such countries from the United States, except at such time and under such regulations and orders and subject to such limitations and exceptions as the President shall prescribe until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine. [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. REED. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I make the same announcement of my pair and its transfer as on the last vote and vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). Announcing my pair as on the last vote and not knowing how my pair, if present, would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. UNDERWOOD (after having voted in the affirmative). In the absence for the time being of the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] I transferred my pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] to the junior Senator from Nevada. Since that time the junior Senator from Nevada has come into the Chamber and voted. I therefore withdraw the announcement I made and transfer my pair to the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. REED (after having voted in the negative). I voted without having announced a transfer of my pair. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and will allow my vote to stand. I make this announcement of general transfer on any vote occurring during the day, provided the Senator from Oklahoma does not enter the Chamber.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN];

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS];

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS]; and

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES].

The result was announced—yeas 55, nays 11, as follows:

YEAS—55.

Ashurst	Gerry	Martin	Smith, Md.
Bankhead	Gronna	Myers	Smoot
Beckham	Hale	New	Sutherland
Brady	Hitchcock	Norris	Swanson
Calder	Husting	Page	Thomas
Chamberlain	Johnson, Cal.	Phelan	Thompson
Colt	Jones, N. Mex.	Pittman	Townsend
Cummins	Jones, Wash.	Poindexter	Trammell
Curtis	Kellogg	Saulsbury	Underwood
Dillingham	Kenyon	Shafroth	Vardaman
Fernald	King	Sheppard	Wadsworth
Fletcher	Knox	Sherman	Watson
France	La Follette	Smith, Ariz.	Wolcott
Gallinger	McCumber	Smith, Ga.

NAYS—11.

Borah	Hardwick	Kirby	Stone
Culberson	Hollis	Ransdell	Walsh
Gore	Kendrick	Reed

NOT VOTING—30.

Brandegee	Johnson, S. Dak.	Overman	Smith, S. C.
Broussard	Lane	Owen	Sterling
Fall	Lewis	Penrose	Tillman
Frelinghuysen	Lodge	Pomerene	Warren
Goff	McKellar	Robinson	Weeks
Harding	McLean	Shields	Williams
Hughes	Nelson	Simmons
James	Newlands	Smith, Mich.

So Mr. FERNALD'S amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the amendment which I tendered a few moments ago as a substitute and which I asked to have withdrawn, I desire to have printed. I ask unanimous consent that that may be done for the information of the Senate. For fear that I did not make my request broad enough, I give notice now that in the Senate I shall ask a separate vote upon this amendment as a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, in Chapter VII, page 26, after line 2, to add a new section, to be known as section 3, as follows:

SEC. 3. Any person who shall export or deliver or attempt to deliver for export any article in violation of this chapter, or of any regulation or order made hereunder, shall be fined not more than $10,000, or, if a natural person, imprisoned for not more than two years, or both; and any article so delivered or exported, or so attempted to be delivered or exported, shall be seized and forfeited to the United States; and any officer, director, or agent of a corporation who participates in any such violation shall be liable to like fine or imprisonment, or both.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same chapter, on page 26, after line 12, to insert a new section, to be known as section 4, as follows:

SEC. 4. Whenever there is reasonable cause to believe that any vessel, domestic or foreign, is about to carry out of the United States any article or articles in violation of the provisions of this chapter, the collector of customs for the district in which such vessel is located is hereby authorized and empowered, subject to review by the Secretary of the Treasury, to refuse clearance to any such vessel, domestic or foreign, for which clearance is required by law, and by formal notice served upon the owners, master, or person or persons in command or charge of any domestic vessel for which clearance is not required by law, to forbid the departure of such vessel from the port, and it shall thereupon be unlawful for such vessel to depart. Whoever, in violation of any of the provisions of this section shall take, or attempt to take, or authorize the taking of any such vessel, out of port or from the jurisdiction of the United States, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than two years, or both; and, in addition, such vessel, her tackle, apparel, furniture, equipment, and her forbidden cargo shall be forfeited to the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I offered an amendment, to be known as section 4, to Chapter VII, designed to suspend or close all exchanges dealing in futures or speculating in food products during the war. This morning a bill was presented in the other House, known as the Lever bill, dealing with that, among other subjects. In the hope that that bill will be reported by the committee before the pending bill is finally disposed of, it would doubtless expedite this legislation if the amendment which I proposed were postponed until after the passage of the so-called Lever bill. I therefore shall not insist upon the amendment now but reserve the right to present it when the bill comes into the Senate, if there is in the interval no action by the other House upon the Lever bill. I have made this suggestion to the Senator having this bill in charge, and it is satisfactory to him.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, in Chapter VIII, on page 27, section 1, line 18, after the word "Government," to insert "to the injury of the United States"; and in line 20, after the word "thereof," to insert "to the injury of the United States"; so as to make the section read:

SECTION 1. Whoever, in relation to any dispute or controversy between a foreign Government and the United States shall willfully and knowingly make any untrue statement, either orally or in writing, under oath before any person authorized and empowered to administer oaths, which the affiant has knowledge or reason to believe will, or may be used to influence the measures or conduct of any foreign Government, or of any officer or agent of any foreign Government, to the injury of the United States, or with a view or intent to influence any measure of or action by the Government of the United States, or any branch thereof, to the injury of the United States, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, section 3, line 14, after the word "or," to strike out "imprisonment" and insert "imprisoned," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. Whoever being an alien, other than a diplomatic or consular officer or attaché, shall act in the United States as an agent of a foreign government without prior notification to the Secretary of State shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I wish to offer the amendment which I send to the desk to section 1 of Chapter VIII.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The committee amendments have not yet been agreed to.

Mr. STERLING. I did not understand that.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, on page 29, section 5, line 5, after the word "property," to strike out "of a foreign government, or any political subdivision thereof," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 5. If two or more persons within the jurisdiction of the United States conspire to injure or destroy property situated within a foreign country, with which the United States is at peace, when the offense designed to be committed in such foreign country constitutes a crime punishable by imprisonment under the laws thereof, and when one or more of such persons commits an act within the jurisdiction of the United States to effect the object of the conspiracy, each of the parties to such conspiracy shall be fined not more than $5,000, or imprisoned not more than three years, or both.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 29, line 14, after the word "Chapter," to strike out the roman numerals "VIII" and insert in lieu thereof "IX."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] has an amendment which he intends to propose to Chapter VIII.

Mr. STERLING. Yes; I now offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 27, line 13, after the word "writing," it is proposed to strike out the words "under oath before any person authorized and empowered to administer oaths"; and in line 15, on the same page, to strike out the word "affiant" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "person making such statement."

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I hope I shall not be thought unduly persistent in offering this amendment, which was offered when the bill was before the Senate at the last session of Congress; but I really want to make this section amount to something; I should like to see it effective, and without this amendment I do not see how it can be of very much force or effect.

The requirement of the bill is that the statement shall be "to the injury of the United States," and it must be made not alone to the injury of the United States, but it must be made under oath. The statement, it will be observed according to this section, must relate to a dispute or a controversy between a foreign government and the United States. It must be willfully made, knowingly made, and the statement must be untrue. As I say, it must be to the injury of the United States; and yet under the terms of the bill, unless that statement is made under oath, the party making it falsely and knowingly in a dispute between this Government and a foreign government and to the injury of this Government can not be punished.

Let us suppose a case. The dispute is the subject of negotiations for a treaty between this and a foreign government; that it is a serious dispute; and, unless settled by treaty, involves the danger of a severance of diplomatic relations between our Government and the foreign government, and, if a severance of diplomatic relations, a possibility, or even a probability, of war. Now, suppose that some emissary makes a statement to a representative of the foreign government which is untrue but which he has reason to believe will be acted upon and which in fact induces action on the part of that government or the representatives of that government and that action is to the injury of the United States. I believe, without reference to the question of whether or not he made the statement under oath, he should be punished for the statement.

Suppose another case, Mr. President. The dispute is the subject of diplomatic correspondence and our Secretary of State has sent a note to the foreign power and some emissary comes forward and says that nothing was meant by that note or the note did not mean what it purported to mean on its face, and the foreign power governs itself accordingly. The statement is wholly untrue; it is made in the belief that it will be acted upon, and is made to the injury of the United States, and yet under this bill, because it is not made under oath, the party can not be punished. Suppose, Mr. President, the controversy relates to a question of damages between the two Governments growing out of the acts of agents or citizens of one Government, and suppose untrue statements are made with the result that the Government of the United States is induced to take less than it is entitled to or to pay more in damages than it should be required to pay. It is evidently to the injury of the United States. But because the statement is not made under oath the party can not be punished for it, although falsely and knowingly made, and with the belief that it would be acted upon in this important controversy with a foreign power.

Why, Mr. President, care will be taken, of course, that a statement intended to influence the action of a foreign government or of our own Government will not under such circumstaces be made under oath. There will either be no occasion to make it under oath, or if an oath is requested of the party making the statement he will say, "Here are my credentials; you ought not to require the statement to be made under oath I do not want to be put to the expense and the trouble of defending myself against a prosecution, although innocent of making any false statement to you."

So, Mr. President, it seems to me that, with these elements to constitute the offense, namely, that the statement be false, that it be knowingly made, that it be made in relation to a foreign controversy with knowledge or reason to believe that it will influence the measures or conduct of either party to the controversy, and that it be made to the injury of the United States, it should make no difference whether it was made under oath or not; in either case the party should be punishable. Hence my amendment. I hope it will prevail in order that this may be made an effective provision.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the Senator presented this amendment before the committee, but the committee thought that it was too broad and that we would go perhaps a little too far if we undertook to punish a man for making a simple statement. The committee thought that the penalty should attach to a man who makes under oath such a statement as is prohibited. So they objected to the amendment and rejected it.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I will simply say in reply to the Senator from North Carolina that the only reference to a case where a statement was made under oath was in the case of the Lusitania, where an oath was made to the effect that the Lusitania was an armed vessel. That is cited. and has been cited again and again, in support of this provision requiring a statement to be made under oath. That case can not be cited as an illustration or as a reason why in a section like this we should require that a statement should be made under oath, the section having so specifically set forth other elements sufficient to constitute a grave offense. Whether the statements are made under oath or not should make no difference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). I inquire if the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I have a pair with that Senator, and in his absence withhold my vote.

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. Not knowing how he would vote if present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS. I inquire if the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. THOMAS. I transfer my pair with that Senator to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and vote "nay."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and vote "nay."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. He being absent, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MYERS. I make the same announcement of my pair and its transfer as heretofore and vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN. Announcing my general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], I transfer that pair to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I am requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN];

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS];

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS]; and

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON].

The result was announced—yeas 11, nays 47, as follows:

YEAS—11.

Brady	France	Knox	Poindexter
Calder	Jones, Wash.	Myers	Watson
Curtis	Kenyon	Page

NAYS—47.

Ashurst	Hardwick	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.
Bankhead	Hitchcock	New	Smoot
Beckham	Hollis	Norris	Stone
Borah	Husting	Overman	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Johnson, Cal.	Pittman	Swanson
Culberson	Jones, N. Mex.	Pomerene	Thomas
Cummins	Kellogg	Reed	Thompson
Fall	Kendrick	Saulsbury	Trammell
Fletcher	King	Shafroth	Underwood
Gallinger	Kirby	Sheppard	Vardaman
Gerry	McKellar	Sherman	Wolcott
Gore	Martin	Simmons

NOT VOTING—38.

Brandegee	Hughes	Owen	Sterling
Broussard	James	Penrose	Tillman
Colt	Johnson, S. Dak.	Phelan	Townsend
Dillingham	La Follette	Ransdell	Wadsworth
Fernald	Lane	Robinson	Walsh
Frelinghuysen	Lewis	Shields	Warren
Goff	Lodge	Smith, Ga.	Weeks
Gronna	McCumber	Smith, Md.	Williams
Hale	McLean	Smith, Mich.
Harding	Newlands	Smith, S. C.

So Mr. STERLING's amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there further amendments to the chapter?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment to section 5, on page 29.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 29, line 3, it is proposed to strike out the word "two" and insert in lieu thereof the word "one," and after the word "conspire," in line 4, to insert the words "with one or more persons within or without the jurisdiction of the United States," so that, if amended, the text will read:

If one or more persons within the jurisdiction of the United States conspire with one or more persons within or without the jurisdiction of the United States—

And so forth.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, as the text reads, two or more persons within the jurisdiction of the United States would be guilty if they conspired together to do any of the forbidden acts defined in this section; but if one of these two persons were on this side of the Canadian line, and a coconspirator were on the other side of the Canadian line, they could conspire to destroy property in Canada, and neither one would be amenable to the laws of the United States. So the amendment I offer provides that if a conspiracy is entered into between two persons, whether they are both within the United States or one within the United States and one without the United States, they shall be guilty of the offense.

Mr. OVERMAN. I accept that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMERENE. Now, Mr. President, I also move to amend the section by inserting, after the word "destroy," on line 4, the words "any person or."

Mr. OVERMAN. What page is that?

Mr. POMERENE. The same page—page 29.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 29, line 4, after the words "injure or destroy," it is proposed to insert the words "any person or," so that, if amended, it will read:

To injure or destroy any person or property.

Mr. POMERENE. The text makes it an offense to conspire to destroy property, but it does not make it an offense to conspire to destroy persons.

Mr. THOMAS. Should not the Senator carry the amendment further? As the section now reads, it refers to the injuring or destruction of "property situated within a foreign country."

Mr. POMERENE. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. Would the Senator say "any person situated within a foreign country"?

Mr. POMERENE. If it was a conspiracy for the purpose of injuring or destroying a human being in the other country, clearly it ought to be an offense, just as though it involved property.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not doubt that, but the language——

Mr. HARDWICK. Suppose that person were an alien enemy?

Mr. POMERENE. If the Senator will follow the language, I think he will not make that criticism.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think so.

Mr. POMERENE. Well, that is not so intended.

Mr. HARDWICK. If that person were an alien enemy or some one else, he would be a person anyhow, and would be subject to this. If a person were an alien enemy, it would be a crime to destroy him. Does the Senator mean it in that way?

Mr. THOMAS. I would suggest that the language "person situated in" is somewhat unusual.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes. The "destroying" of persons is unusual, too.

Mr. POMERENE. We are speaking now of friendly countries.

Mr. OVERMAN. I know, but my idea is that the Senator might get a better word than "destroying" a person.

Mr. POMERENE. I certainly want to avoid that construction. It may be that the language should be changed. If the Senator will permit this to be passed, I will change my amendment so as to avoid that construction.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. I want to get the thought of the Senator from Ohio in my mind. Does he intend to make it a crime for a person or two or more persons in this country to give aid and comfort to a revolution which is proposed in a foreign country?

Mr. POMERENE. I am not quite sure that I grasp the Senator's question.

Mr. CUMMINS. Suppose, before the Spanish-American War, the Cubans revolted. They had friends in the United States, and a great deal of the propaganda—a large part of the movement for the libertion of Cuba—took place in the United States. I am using this illustration purely as an illustration. Does the Senator from Ohio, by his amendment, desire to prevent the United States from becoming the home of such propaganda as that?

Mr. POMERENE. I have not had that in mind. What I had in mind, briefly, was this: Under the bill, as reported by the committee, if a conspiracy is entered into for the purpose of blowing up a building in Canada that would be a violation of this section of the statute; but if the conspiracy was to kill a member of the Canadian Parliament or a business man that would not be an offense under this statute. Now, my thought was that the person of a citizen of Canada ought to be just as sacred to us as the property which he might own. That is the situation which I want to meet.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Ohio is right about that phase of it; but the Senator from Ohio must be aware that there was in the mind of the person who originally drew this section the purpose to make it impossible for the people of the United States to give aid and comfort to revolutions in other countries. I think we might just as well come to the point itself.

Take Ireland: There has been going on in this country for a great many years a movement for the freedom of Ireland. A very large amount of money has been sent from the United States from time to time in support of that movement, to use no harsher term. Does the Senator from Ohio believe that we ought to make it a crime for those who believe that Ireland should be free to enter into, if you please, sympathetically and with money, a movement to promote an uprising in Ireland which has for its purpose the independence of that people?

Mr. POMERENE. In my amendment I had no reference whatsoever to Ireland or to anything of an Irish nature at all.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am sure of that; but the Senator from Ohio will see at once that when the section is amended as he proposes to amend it, it would not require a very gifted imagination to draw within the terms of the laws every effort upon the part of the people of this country to aid the struggles of the people of other countries to maintain or secure their rights.

Mr. POMERENE. Does not the Senator think that the construction which he seeks to place upon the language now is rather strained?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know. The thought arose in my mind at once. I knew it was not in the contemplation of the Senator from Ohio; and inasmuch as he asked that the section go over, I wanted him to reflect upon the interpretation which a great many people have put upon this paragraph of the law.

Mr. POMERENE. I will be very glad to bear that in mind, and be glad to confer with the Senator on the subject.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am just as much opposed to conspiracies which are directed toward property or directed toward persons as anyone can be; but while we are engaged in a great fight for democracy throughout the world I am not willing to suppress the sympathies which individuals in the United States may feel for revolutions in which we may not take any national part.

Mr. POMERENE. I had no such thought as that in mind when I offered the amendment, but if it may go over I shall be glad to consider it further.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to have this chapter adopted. I do not think the Senator, when he thinks about it, will introduce it. If he does, he can introduce it in the Senate.

Mr. POMERENE. If that may be passed over for the time being, I will consider it further.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator let this chapter be adopted?

Mr. POMERENE. I wish to offer another amendment to this section.

Mr. OVERMAN. Very well.

Mr. POMERENE. On line 9, I move to strike out the word "and" and substitute therefor the word "or."

As I construe this section, it would not be an offense to enter into a conspiracy to destroy property in another country, but the conspiracy would have to be followed by the actual destruction of the property. I do not think that was in the mind of the committee when this section was drafted. In other words, if a conspiracy has been entered into for the purpose of destroying property, that ought to be an offense complete in itself, without making it necessary to show that there was an actual overt act committed under the conspiracy.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment. Is there any objection to the chapter going over?

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I just said to the Senator that I should like to have this chapter adopted. He can introduce his amendment in the Senate, if he still wishes to introduce it.

Mr. POMERENE. What will be gained by it?

Mr. OVERMAN. Why, we will have all these chapters adopted, and then the bill will go into the Senate.

Mr. POMERENE. With that understanding, I will not object.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I desire to ask——

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask what disposition was made of this amendment?

Mr. OVERMAN. I understood that was to go over.

Mr. POMERENE. No; I was not insisting upon it; but the last amendment I offered was to strike out "and" and substitute therefor the word "or."

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not know whether it was put to the Senate or not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was not put. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I want to suggest to the Senator, before the Senate votes upon any such proposition as that, whether it is not necessary that not only the conspiracy shall be made so far as word and plan is concerned, but also that it shall be conjunctively required that some attempt shall be made somewhere to carry it into execution. There will be very great danger, otherwise, of people using this provision of the law to lay false information against their neighbors; and was not that the reason why, in drawing this bill, the committee followed the plan of the law generally? It seems to me that the general principles of law applicable to this subject ought to be maintained by the Congress in enacting legislation on this subject.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, what the Senator suggests is rather a question of degree of proof than anything else.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. In effect it would be that, I believe. It does seem to me that if there are in this country any individuals who are vicious enough to enter into a conspiracy looking to the destruction of a bridge or a building in one of the allied countries, and that proof is clearly made before a proper tribunal, the person guilty of entering into that conspiracy ought to be punished; and I do not think we ought to wait until some overt act is committeed before seeking to punish it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, with all deference to the Senator from Ohio, I think the Senator is wrong about it, and wrong on the very theory on which all the principles of law, as applied in almost every civilized country, rest. There might be some advantages to accrue from charging somebody with entering into a conspiracy, but there are a great many disadvantages. People might use the law as an engine of oppression, and bear false witness against their neighbors; and I think it is pretty well to require proof of some overt act before we make this serious crime punishable in that way. At least, an attempt should be made, as the Senator from North Carolina suggests on the side, to do something in a physical way, in the way of an overt act, before we provide such punishment. So I think the department and the committee were right. I believe it will be far safer to stick to the established principles of the old rule.

The Senator from North Carolina calls my attention to the fact that the very carefully considered language of the committee is, "commits an act within the jurisdiction of the United States to effect the object of the conspiracy." That is required. I think the Senator from North Carolina agrees that it is probably safer to leave this language as it is; and I hope it will be kept as it is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, there is a provision in section 2a of Chapter II of the bill, subdivisions (b) and (c), which relates to the publication in newspapers of forbidden information. I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina when he thinks that provision of the bill will be reached? It is to be called up again. When it is reached, I desire to express my opinions with respect to it; and as I am now quite busily engaged with matters that keep me more or less out of the Chamber, I should be glad to know, if the Senator can tell me, when that section of the bill, and particularly that part of the section of the bill to which I refer, will be brought again before the Senate?

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, Chapters XI and XII will cause a great deal of debate in the Senate, and it will continue at least through Saturday and probably Monday. This chapter has already been passed in the Committee of the Whole, and when the bill goes into the Senate there is a notice given by the Senator from California that he will move to strike out subsections (b) and (c).

Mr. STONE. Then it will come up in the Senate?

Mr. OVERMAN. It will come up in the Senate.

Mr. STONE. I desire to be heard upon it, when it is brought up.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will let the Senator know.

The SECRETARY. On page 29, line 14, after the word "Chapter," the committee proposes to strike out "VIII" and to insert "IX."

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there any amendments to this chapter? The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to as in Committee of the Whole.

The SECRETARY. At the top of page 32, line 1, after the word "Chapter," it is proposed to strike out "IX" and insert "X."

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there any amendments to this chapter? The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to as in Committee of the Whole.

The SECRETARY. On page 33, line 5, after the word "Chapter," it is proposed to strike out "X" and insert "XI."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. After line 6 the committee proposes to insert a new section under the heading of "Search warrants," as follows:

SECTION 1. A search warrant may be issued in conformity with the provisions of this act for the purpose of searching any premises or person to discover any property, or papers, held, secured, or used, or intended to be held, secured, or used, in violation of or in aid of a violation of any law of the United States, or of a treaty of the United States, or of the rights or obligations of the United States under the law of nations.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I ask leave at this time to offer an amendment, to be known as section 9. I desire to have it printed and lie over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That will be done.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, there will be, I think, some discussion with regard to Chapter XI. It involves a very important subject. It is a radical departure from all the legislation of the United States; and I wondered whether the Senator from North Carolina thinks it would promote a final vote to take it up to-night?

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I know it can not be taken up and considered to-night; but I should like the Senator, if he has no objection, to let the committee amendments to this section be read.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if that were done I should have to send for a number of Senators who have asked me, in case Chapter XI was reached, to notify them, because they desired to be here. I do not think that would save more than five minutes, and perhaps it would require to-morrow a reconsideration of some matters in view of their absence.

Mr. OVERMAN. I was not going to ask for the adoption of the amendments to-night.

Mr. SMOOT. I mean, of the committee amendments. There may be objections to them by Senators who are not present at this time.

Mr. OVERRMAN. I simply ask that the amendments be read, and then I will allow them to go over until to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. These are amendments to Chapter XI.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I believe I had better move to take a recess now. The reading of the amendments will not amount to much. I therefore move that a recess be taken until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, if the Senator will withhold that motion for a moment, there is an amendment intended to be proposed to this bill relating to the manufacture of alcohol from cereals, grains, etc. I ask that certain matter which I send to the desk be placed in the RECORD, to be available when that amendment is taken up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

FRANCE AND ALCOHOLISM IN WAR TIME.

[Statement by Cora Frances Stoddard, executive secretary Scientific Temperance Federation.]

The United States is being urged by the allied nations now at war to avoid as far as possible all conditions which have been hampering to the other nations in the development of their war policies.

From France, as from Great Britain, come illustrations of the handicap which drink exerts in war time. The magnificent work done by France during the war is not depreciated by these illustrations, but they do suggest incumbrance which the United States would do well to avoid.

Soon after the war began France struck at one of the serious sources of alcoholism by prohibiting absinthe. The hours of sale were somewhat restricted. Gen. Joffre forbade the sale of intoxicants to soldiers in the war zone. The only alcohol supposed to be allowed the soldiers was that issued in the rations.

The following pages are taken, unless otherwise stated, from a recent book, L'Union Sacree Contre L'Alcoolisme, by Jean Finot, editor of La Revue and secretary of L'Alarme, an organization of which the President of France, M. Raymond Poincare, is the honorary president. The book has evidently been passed by the censor.

Owing to agricultural and commercial conditions peculiar to France, M. Finot believes that it is impossible at present to prohibit the production and sale of wine. Hence, he can not be said to be writing from a radical point of view, as he is urging only the prohibition of distilled liquors and some further limitations on the general traffic for the reasons that appear in the illustrations given.

MOBILIZATION AND TRAINING-CAMP DIFFICULTIES.

In quoting letters it will be understood that the omission of the designation of regiments, etc., is by M. Finot.

Here is a letter addressed to us by an artillery officer of ———:

"On August 2 and the following days I was present in Brittany at the departure of trainloads of mobilized men, all intoxicated to such a point that the guards were ordered to lock the compartments. Although this was done, arrived at Brest, these marines continually found means of getting too much to drink. And as they were more embarrassing than useful the naval officer in charge of the district sent them back home."

In a recent address before the Society of Civil Engineers of France M. Victor Cambon spoke as follows amid the applause of his numerous hearers:

"I have seen in Brittany villages where 40 per cent of the conscripts are invalided sad victims of the alcoholism of their parents. All the rest are at the front, but how many will come back? And it is from these 40 per cent of human wrecks that the Bretons are going to perpetuate their race!

"We shall undoubtedly defeat Germany, declared M. Cambon, who knows our adversaries thoroughly, but if we do not cut off alcohol to-day, alcohol will cut us off to-morrow."

Here, for example, is what we read in l'Ouest-Eclair (May 17). In this article clearly appears not only the grave responsibility resting on all who protect this evil but also the immediate danger which menaces the national defense.

"From 5 to 9 o'clock in the evening the stations, which are overflowing with troops (young recruits and old reservists), turn loose in the city bands of men away from home, having nothing to do, who, during these four hours, go from cabaret to cabaret, cramming themselves into low dogholes black with smoke, where the air seems unbreathable. After these long stops many of them go out staggering to return to the barracks.

"What can our generals be thinking of this preparation for the fatigues of a campaign, and how can one conceive of the intensive training of our young soldiers under such conditions?

"Thus, well before the departure for the front, the result of this state of affairs shows itself by the daily admission to the hospitals of numerous sick—so numerous that it has been necessary to find an annex to receive them.

"Grippe, pneumonia, or some other affection that would not be dangerous to a healthy organism carries these men off in two or three days, owing to complications due to alcohol. The mortality among these men is frightful. All the physicians now attached to military hospitals could testify to the fact that France thus loses every day hundreds of soldiers. At a time when so many are suffering from this war is it not extremely painful to see those upon whom we count for deliverance waste their feeble resources and abase and destroy themselves by alcohol when the whole strength of the nation should be straining toward a single end—victory!

"I consider that the generals who command in the rear and prepare the new recruits have a very heavy responsibility. It is not possible when alcoholizing oneself to prepare to undergo the fatigues of marches, assaults, long watches, rigors, or extremes of weather, and if pneumonia makes ravages in the training stations, what will it do in the trenches when cold and fatigue will come more surely than enemy shells to finish the work of alcohol?"

EFFICIENCY OF SOLDIERS.

At the time of the discussion of the law against absinthe in the Senate, M. Pulle concluded his speech with these significant words:

"Almost all men brought before courts-martial for offenses toward superior officers are victims of alcoholism."

Here is an extract from a letter (April 5, 1915) from Mme. Texier, president of the Rouen Woman's Suffrage Union. She says:

"At Rouen British soldiers, as well as the French, who are forbidden to enter the cafés, use children as agents for getting alcohol into the camps or canteens. It is a deplorable example, everybody knows, and in spite of all protests from the antialcohol societies and from the friends of childhood, the trade does not stop. The soldiers generally send for 10 sous' worth of spirits, 4 sous' worth of coffee, and 5 sous for sugar, and say to the child, 'Hide the bottle under your blouse, and if anybody asks you what it is say that it is wine.'"

The following is a paragraph from a sergeant:

"Several of my comrades who have allowed themselves to drink too much were excellent soldiers at the beginning of the war. Under the influence of alcohol they have become discouraged and insubordinate. I have noticed also that those who drank too much got tired more quickly. How many I have seen give out and sit down in the trench because they had drunk too much the night before."

The commanding general of the —— army corps writes me:

"Continue your campaign, which has already produced some results. It has, you may be sure, much influence on the decisions made in the military zones. You have thus helped save whole regiments. * * * Numbers of soldiers are good; quality is better. But with alcohol, no good soldiers; and if the Government were to apply outside the army zone the measures we have adopted, the quality of our soldiers would increase in every respect."

"Alas," writes Col. ———, of the ———, "the administrative powers often disorganize our work. A bridge separates our ——— from the civil zone. Soldiers off duty have only to cross it to be again prey to the solicitations of the liquor dealers. They finally come back to us mortally injured by the immoderate use of drinks. They even frequently bring back drinks for their comrades. If the people in civil life only knew all the evil which results in the army, doubtless they would not hesitate for a moment to shut up all the keepers of wine shops and their defenders."

"I have before me," writes M. Finot, "a court journal which relates in detail the following revolting facts:

"'"Territorial" Pilardeau came back the other evening to Mormant, from quarters, arm in arm with his comrade Capelle. Corpl. Budeau, seeing the intoxicated condition of both of them, asked them to quiet down and to retire immediately. The wise advice angered Pilardeau, who attacked Corpl. Budeau and struck him in the chest with such violence that he fell against a gun rack.

"'The savage act, styled "violence to a superior," was severely condemned by the second court-martial, which, in spite of the plea of the advocate, condemned Pilardeau to the death penalty. His comrade, Capelle, who had only shown disrespect, got out of it with five years in prison.'"

When some day the real diminution of our strength due to alcoholism is known, the central power, which might have stopped the evil from the beginning, will have a formidable account to render. We might have filled this column, 225 pages, with the alarming letters that have come to us for several months from large and small cities, towns, and villages.

A seller from the city of Dijon writes, in part:

"I understand all the harm that unwillingly I have done to my fellow citizens. * * * The financial condition of my poor family does not permit me to close my establishment. * * * But continue your campaign, because I see around me the evil that alcoholism is doing to our soldiers. My poor brother-in-law who, when wounded, received permission to come back home, so far from being cured, has just succumbed, after having been intoxicated several times in the company of his comrades."

A HANDICAP TO RECOVERY IN WOUNDED SOLDIERS.

This last letter introduces a new count against alcohol, its influence in delaying the recovery of wounded soldiers. On this point M. Finot has several illustrations.

We have seen, he says, that some generals commanding army corps have definite action (in the protection of soldiers against drunkenness). But the territory outside the firing line also requires protection. The stations of the troops, the ambulances, and the hospitals are scattered all over the land, and, nevertheless, nothing is yet done to safeguard the health of the troops and of the wounded.

There is nothing more contagious than the passion for drink. Every soldier who is addicted to it easily leads away his comrades who yield to the spirit of comradeship.

Quite recently it was decided to pay convalescents a monthly allowance. But as the sale of intoxicants to wounded soldiers was not forbidden the latter spent all they received with the drink sellers.

I am told that several refuges for wounded soldiers established in the outskirts of Paris by philanthropic women are on the point of being closed. The unfortunate convalescents, unable to resist the temptation of alcohol, often return home dead drunk and provoke scandals which frighten and discourage the ladies at the head of the institutions.

For reasons easy to understand we can not publish the names of several ladies who have lately sent me their grievances on this subject. It would be superfluous to multiply examples.

Mme. Z., who directs an ambulance for convalescents, told me she had to call on the police at least three times a week to have soldiers carried off who came back dead drunk. One enterprising convalescent having a few francs at his disposal is sufficient to lead off a dozen others into a debauch.

The evil thus increases daily. I have recently visited some 20 hospitals and ambulances, and everywhere the directresses have said the same thing: "Alcoholism does irreparable harm to the wounded and the sick. Why is it that the Government takes no action to save our poor soldiers?"

In addition to the press of Paris, which is helping our efforts, all the regional newspapers are doing the same. There are published in them from time to time such revolting facts that one would think them impossible if the local censorship in permitting their publication did not thus guarantee their authenticity.

Here, for example, is what we read in l'Ouest-Eclair of May 17 (an article already quoted in these pages which was sent M. Finot by a physician of Rennes). In this article clearly appears not only the grave responsibility resting on those who protect the evil, but also the immediate danger which menaces national defense:

"All physicians and surgeons who have had the care of the wounded since the beginning of the war will tell you the enormous difference there is in the rapidity, or even possibility, of recovery in two wounded men according to whether they are alcoholic or not.

"The most terrible mutilations heal with a rapidity that seems miraculous in a healthy organism; on the contrary, the alcoholics either die more quickly of superacute complications or cumber the hospitals for months with interminable wounds.

"When finally we have them almost cured, can you realize how heart-breaking it is for us doctors, as happened to me to-day, to see one of those whom after many dangers we had almost pulled through, make use of his first leave to enter one after the other the three saloons close by the hospital and come back drunk in the evening?"

I had occasion, says M. Finot, to confer with a large number of physicians who care for the military wounded. One ought to hear them relate the difficulties in certain garrisons caused by former and recent alcoholism. For the patients, barely recovered, go to the taverns for consolation and amusement.

Here is an extract from a letter sent me by M. Hayaux, the distinguished editor of la Pensee ouvriers:

"In a city on the western front, six soldiers whose wounds were nearly healed had permission to leave the hospital for a few hours in charge of a sergeant also convalescent. They went to a little village stopping at the smoking room of the place and asked for drink. When evening came only one was in condition to get up and start for the hospital. The five others and the sergeant were under the table. In going through the streets this one made himself so conspicuous that he was arrested by two gendarmes and taken back to the hospital where he arrived so ill that he had to be placed under medical care again. His five comrades and the officer did not return until the next morning, and then in what condition? The military authorities, shocked by this spree, had all seven sent to prison. The sergeant, who had served so heroically at the front that he had received mention in the order of the day and in recognition of his exploits was going to be promoted, will be degraded. The soldiers who had fought courageously and were to have had 15 days' convalescence leave of absence at home, having done their prison term, will return to the front without having been able to embrace their families."

In a document which came to me from St. Lunaire early in December, a lady well known in Paris, wrote me, among other things, the following:

"Our little community has about 550 wounded, who, when hardly fit to go out, spend their time in the drink shops. Unfortunate Algerians, Arabs, Moroccans, or Senegalese are tempted by their trench comrades, and the drunkenness produced frightful results in these children of distant lands. They become a veritable plague to the population, to say nothing of the danger they run as to their own health."

I have asked a lady of great intelligence and sympathy, of Norman birth, to relate to our readers the ravages of alcoholism in her native district. Here is the letter she writes me. It goes back to the months of July and August, 1914, and enables one to get an idea of a Norman locality in the weeks preceding and following the declaration of war:

"The catastrophe burst.

"From the first days of mobilization our Tenth Corps included numerous cases of epilepsy, and I have recently proven in the young conscripts of 1915 the degeneracy of this Norman race, which has produced so many large and sturdy lads; almost all were thin and stunted. One or two generations more and alcoholism will finish killing it off. It is not rare to meet in our section men 40 years old, strong in appearance, who can not sign their name without a trembling hand.

"Before caring for the wounded I had no idea to what extent the love of drink can possess certain men. The soldiers who come from the people especially only live to get out to go to the drink shop. In one sitting they destroy the results of long treatment and watchful care. This is what happened to me in the case of a sick wounded soldier, attacked by albuminaria who, hardly out of bed, went out to get abominably intoxicated."

Dr. Cochot, of auxiliary hospital No. 7, at Cannes, has written a letter to the editor of Le Temps, referring to one of my articles in that journal:

"As a Red Cross physician at Cannes I am glad to be able to bring to the support of the opinion of M. Jean Finot my daily experience at Cannes, both from the point of view of the treatment of the alcoholic wounded, who either mends badly or not at all, and from the point of view of the convalescents, whose first visits to the city are often, alas, to the drink shops. If personally I have not had these delinquents treated rigorously as those of whom M. Finot speaks, it is because I wished to avoid punishment (which could only be prison) for those brave fellows and valiant soldiers, on the whole less to blame than those who sell, or allow to be sold, alcohol under the multiple labels used by the trade."

Count de Cominges, mayor of Clairoix, writes on this point:

"I have always had a horror of alcoholism, but during the war I have been able to prove the shame and seriousness of its ravages as much among the civil population as among the soldiers. Our sick soldiers, when alcoholic, become the appointed victims of typhoid and infection. I am mayor of a small village of 800 people, almost on the firing line. We have six liquor sellers."

ALCOHOLISM AND NATIONAL DEFENSE.

Thanks to the intelligent initiative of one of my friends, writes M. Finot, nearly all the chambers of commerce in France are now proceeding to careful inquiries as to the ominous relation of alcoholism to national industry. It is especially a question of bringing out the facts as to what French industry loses from the point of view of quantity and value of products obtained under the influence of alcohol.

Further, they are investigating as to how the manufacture of munitions and guns is handicapped by the alcoholism that prevails throughout France.

For a moment let us dip into a report admirable for its clarity and precision which is offered me by the Chamber of Commerce of Epinal. The latter took the trouble to interrogate 120 employers selected among the heads of establishments or presidents of syndicates.

Certain figures make even those shudder who know on what to depend as to the importance of this evil; and if one wished to judge of it by the department of the Vosges, one would easily arrive at frightful estimates. Yet this department is far from figuring among the most alcoholic. Thus M. Baudoin, president of the syndicate of contractors, estimates at 15,000 the number of building workmen in the Vosges. He declares that a third of them—that, is, 5,000—give themselves over to drunkenness with such passion that the number of discharges reaches frightful proportions, and they talk to us of a successful struggle with German industry so powerfully organized!

Almost all the employers have observed that alcoholism has increased with the war. Drunkenness reaches its maximum on Monday and takes off about a third of the men, to say nothing of the women, who drink as much as the men. Another employer from the district of St. Die makes this statement: "If I were to be strict toward the drunkards, I would have to discharge a third of my workmen." Three employers of the district of Remiremont declare, "We can not deal too severely with drunkenness; we should lack hand labor." One of them adds, "In varying degrees 75 per cent of my adult employees are alcoholic."

If one wishes to get an idea of the ravages in other departments according to the picture drawn in the Vosges, one will easily perceive that the French race is destined to disappear.

Naturally its industry will not only not be able to pick up after the war, but, on the contrary, will be condemned to complete ruin before many years.

In one precise investigation covering 170 men who could not be kept in one of our factories, writes a great employer, a little more than 80 were dismissed for flagrant and repeated drunkenness.

The engineer, Paul Renaud, director of l'Institut Scientifique et Industriel, who is regarded as one of the most enterprising men in the industrial world, has been glad to make at our request a most complete inquiry among the engineers and superintendents of factories as to the inroads of alcohol in the industrial field.

Among the large correspondence which is in my hands I find, among others, the quotations which follow.

M. Amblard, director of the steel works of the Manche, writes:

"Alcoholism from the beginning of the war has been clearly injurious to our production, and that to an extent which has seemed to me considerably more than that of preceding months. * * * Yet our product concerns directly and indirectly national defense, for orders designed for war have mobilized workmen. For the latter the question of alcoholism is not a matter of concern. They are generally serious workmen, for the most part strangers to the region, and the severe penalties to which their military position would expose them protects them sufficiently from temptation. * * * It is quite otherwise with the group of nonmobilized workers. Nearly all are people of the section. A good part of them frequently give themselves over to alcoholism, and repression is almost impossible by reason of the large number of cases and the actual impossibility of replacing those dismissed. Thus it frequently happens that we send away workmen in a state of drunkenness whom we are obliged, for lack of better, to take on again some days later." * * *

M. F. Brazzola, constructing engineer (Paris-Passy), among others, points out the following:

"I have not had to suffer from this during the war, because I suspended my enterprise, but formerly it was a true calamity. I put through in the Calvados some quite important works. I may say that 50 per cent of my laborers got through by getting intoxicated. The work naturally suffered, which obliged us to disband, in part, our own working force and to replace it by foreign labor, which also finished in this unlucky environment by becoming contaminated."

M. A. Cothias, of the Cothias Metal C. (Ivry-Port Seine), informs us:

"During the war the only serious disagreements that we have had with the help had drink as purely the cause, either that the men on resuming work after breakfast are more or less in a state of drunkenness or that they bring wine into the workshops or, again, that the intoxication of the evening before prevents them from resuming work next day. We experience this difficulty even with the mobilized men who have been sent us. * * * Our production is wholly concerned with national defense."

The letter from M. Georges Chretien, who directs in the same section a workshop for the repair of army automobiles, is still more significant:

"My workshop employs about 300 men, of whom half are employed absolutely as in their civil life. I have been struck by their fine bearing and accomplishment of work. * * * I attribute this fact to the sobriety which they are obliged to practice for pecuniary and disciplinary reasons, and that especially since the application of rigorous measures against the consumers of alcohol."

The director of a Rouen company declares:

"We can only deplore in a general way the injurious influence of alcoholism from the point of view of the output of hand labor. * * * Alcoholism certainly counts for 50 to 60 per cent in reducing the actual output of our port workers. Yet we employ on the average from 1,000 to 1,200. Our business concerns to the highest degree national defense, as we are charged, with our allied company, with supplying the camp around Paris with coal and grain. (Without coal, there is no motive power, no munitions; without grain, no feeding of the armies.) * * * Owing to the scarcity of labor, we are reduced to accepting, or at least to accepting their services anew, although we know their failing as regards alcohol. We content ourselves with taking off boats and stopping work when drunkenness has affected the men to such a degree that it would be too dangerous to put them in charge."

Think well on this: The output diminished from 50 to 60 per cent with 1,000 to 1,200 workmen; that means that, in a single concern so important for national defense, alcoholism makes us lose daily the work of about 600 men.

M. Clavel, manager of a factory furnishing all kinds of tools, as well as machinery for public works, states that—

"Alcoholism is almost always disastrous. Those of our workmen who succumb to it are half as effective workers as the others, taking into consideration the necessary days they lose in coming back to normal ability and moral strength. Yet our output 80 times out of 100 is destined for national defense."

The director of Bermont & Co. Foundries (Dole, Jura) declares that—

"Alcoholism is sternly treated here, but we are so short of hand labor that one is obliged to resort to men addicted to drink.

"These letters which have been address to us by the heads of factories are as numerous as they are disquieting."

Agriculture in its turn feels the effects. At this time when it is necessary to utilize all available resources in order to meet the exigencies of the war as it is prolonged, the work in the fields is terribly paralyzed.

I have lived for several years in one of the most charming places about Paris. My little market town, situated in Montmorency Forest and some miles from the railroad, is inhabited by a quiet and peaceable people. The alcoholism which began its ravages there a few years ago assumed exceedingly disquieting proportions with the outbreak of the war.

The wife of one of the richest growers of the country has recently written me this admission so tragic in its artlessness:

"I have given up working my fields because my workmen who before the war only got d— once a week, during the war get d— three times a week."

And this good woman adds:

"If the Government had closed the drink-selling places, or at least had forbidden the sale of alcohol, we could otherwise have lived happily in France."

It has been revealed to us quite recently that we pay for many products almost double their value because of the difficulty of getting the boats unloaded in our ports. Help is lacking for unloading coal in France at Havre or Rouen, because the larger part of the longshoremen spend half or three-fourths of their day in the public houses.

THE FUTURE OF FRENCH INDUSTRY AND COMMERCE.

We have seen how alcohol by its influence on industrial production imperils national defense. But the future also of French industry and commerce are endangered.

M. Paul Renaud, president of the board of directors of several of our largest industrial companies, writes me on this subject as follows:

"From the day after the Battle of the Marne, in spite of the doubts and hesitation of my colleagues, I undertook to get to going again the eight industrial or commercial enterprises which are under my direction.

"After securing a small production in October, I had reached during January full production in four of these concerns.

"The most appalling obstacle against which I had to contend was alcoholism; in a single one of our factories, in order to replace 40 workmen called away by the mobilization, I appealed to eight or nine refugee committees to the employment service of the minister of the interior; and thus in an almost exclusively Breton environment I engaged, successively, 215 refugees or unemployed, paying their traveling expenses from Paris to the factory, not starting them until assured that they desired to work.

"And in spite of that I have not at this moment gotten together the 40 workmen that were necessary.

"Why? Because every day our factory superintendent is obliged to discharge one or two for drunkenness."

DAVID LLOYD-GEORGE ON DRINK.

The leader of the British Empire has said:

"We are fighting Germany, Austria, and drink, and so far as I can see the greatest of these three deadly foes is drink."

WAR PROHIBITION CONSERVATION COMMITTEE,
Boston, Mass., April 18, 1917.

DEAR SIR: President Wilson has said: "The world's food reserves are low. The importance of adequate food supplies, especially for the present year, is superlative." And, in the same address, "I hope that clergymen will not think this theme an unworthy or inappropriate subject of comment and homily from their pulpits."

We are therefore sending you verified facts concerning the food waste in liquor, hoping that you can use them in your sermon, and, if it seems best, ask your congregation to go on record for war prohibition and send the resolution to President Wilson.

Do you realize that over 20,000,000 bushels of corn (average for 1911–1915) go yearly into distilled spirits alone—enough at 3,400 calories a day (a man's ration) to support 1,000,000 of our soldiers for 17 months?

Do you realize that the rye that went into distilled spirits (1916) would make over 200,000,000 loaves of bread, enough to supply the city of New York for 100 days? (Frederick Boyd Stevenson, Brooklyn Eagle.)

Do you realize that hops have practically no nutritive value? Our 44,000 acres of hops planted with oats and potatoes would support 255,000 men for a year.

And so we might go on, showing item by item the vast waste in brewing and distilling. But we will sum it up by saying that approximately (allowing for the distilled spirits withdrawn for denaturing) 6,000,000,000 pounds of foodstuffs go yearly into beer and distilled liquor—enough to support 7,000,000 hard-working men for an entire year.

And note that corn in the form of whisky costs sixteen times as much as good nourishing corn meal.

Besides this there is the loss of labor and waste of transportation. With our present shortage of cars every cubic inch of space is needed for the bare necessities.

Do you wonder that Kenyon L. Butterfield, president of the Association of American Agricultural Colleges and Experiment Stations, says, "Prohibition has become an economic necessity."

HOUSE OF COMMONS,
April 2, 1917.

DEAR MR. DINWIDDIE: I am very much obliged to you for your letter of the 22d of January, inclosing copy of the decision of the Supreme Court sustaining the Webb-Kenyon interstate liquor shipment law. It seems a very important decision, and I congratulate the Prohibitionists on the victory they have achieved.

We watch with rather envious eyes the wonderful strides which prohibition is making in your country. Here, though the need is even greater than yours, the cause makes but slow progress. The Government is being driven by the hard facts of the situation to reduce the output of beer and spirits, but they move reluctantly, and they only go a very little way at a time. * * * Public opinion is growing in favor of prohibition, and if the Government would take the final step of altogether suspending the sale and manufacture of intoxicants during the war, I am confident that our people would not only acquiesce in it but would welcome it as the surest means of safeguarding the food supply and the efficiency of the nation.

With all good wishes, I am, yours, very truly,

LEIF JONES, M. P.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 2893) to amend section 10 of chapter 2 of the Criminal Code, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a petition of the Cole Motor Car Co., of Indianapolis, Ind., remonstrating against a proposed 5 per cent tax on automobiles, and suggesting a specific tax on all automobiles in use and to be purchased for use, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the United Irish Societies of Seattle, Wash., praying for the freedom of Ireland, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a telegram in the nature of a memorial from the United Brewery Workers of America remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to prohibit the manufacture of beer as a war measure, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented petitions of the Commercial Club of Mathis; of the congregations of 25 churches of Austin; of sundry citizens of Rotan; and of the faculty and students of Trinity University, Waxahachie, all in the State of Texas; and of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union No. 2, of Washington, D. C., praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of the Board of Trustees of Ross, Cal., praying for universal compulsory military service, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HALE. I present resolutions adopted at a meeting of the Cumberland Club, of Portland, Me., which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions of Cumberland Club, April 21, 1917.

Resolved, That the members of the Cumberland Club declare their absolute approval of the action of President Wilson in asking Congress to accept the status of war thrust upon the United States by the Imperial German Government, and of the subsequent action of Congress declaring the existence of a state of war and conferring upon the President full powers to prosecute it to the extent of all the resources of the United States.

We also pledge ourselves unreservedly to the support of the Government for maintaining its ideals of democracy, liberty, and humanity.

Believing that the Government has the right to demand of every citizen such service as he is best able to render for its defense, whether in the Army, the Navy, or among the workers who furnish sustenance and munitions of war to the men at the front: Be it further

Resolved, That we indorse and pledge ourselves heartily to support the policy of universal military and other public service.

CUMBERLAND CLUB,
By J.C. HAMLEN, President.

PORTLAND, ME.

Mr. HALE presented petitions of sundry citizens of Maine, praying for the organization and maintenance of all new units of engineering troops by the War Department and not by the individual States, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. COLT. I present resolutions of the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[State of Rhode Island, etc., in general assembly, January session, A. D. 1917.]

Resolution urging upon Congress and the Senators and Representatives therein from the State of Rhode Island the enactment of legislation authorizing a survey of proposed harbor lines at the mouth of the Seekonk River.

Whereas the matter of the improvement of navigation in the Seekonk River, leading from Providence Harbor to the city of Pawtucket, particularly by the establishment of important modifications of the present harbor line at the entrance of said Seekonk River into Providence Harbor, has been a matter of careful consideration by State commissions created for that purpose, and by committees representing the municipalities affected by such proposed changes, as well as by representatives of the various transportation interests of the State; and

Whereas there has been presented to this general assembly an act entitled "An act to establish harbor lines at the entrance to the Seekonk River, being an act in amendment of chapter 557 of the Public Laws, passed at the January session, A. D. 1865; as amended by chapter 476 of the Public Laws, passed at the January session, A. D. 1885; by chapter 915 of the Public Laws, passed at the January session, A. D. 1890; by chapter 1096 of the Public Laws, passed at the January session, A. D. 1892; and by chapter 424 of the Public Laws, passed at the September session, A. D. 1896; also being an act in amendment of senate resolution No. 21, passed at the May session, A. D. 1877; also being an act in amendment of chapter 758 of the Public Laws, passed at the January session, A. D. 1879; also being an act in amendment of chapter 600 of the Public Laws, passed at the January session, A. D. 1866; as amended by chapter 759 of the Public Laws, passed at the January session, A. D. 1879," the same being senate act No. 143, accompanied by a map indicating certain proposed changes in the State harbor lines at the entrance to said Seekonk River; and

Whereas it is necessary that the authority of the Government of the United States shall be had before any harbor line established by the State of Rhode Island can become fully operative: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island respectfully request of the Congress of the United States that there may be included in the next river and harbor bill a provision authorizing a survey of said entrances to the Seekonk River, particularly with reference to the establishment of modifications of the present harbor lines substantially as indicated upon the said map which has been presented; and be it further

Resolved, That the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Rhode Island be, and they hereby are, requested to use their efforts to secure the passage of legislation authorizing such survey; and the secretary of state is hereby instructed to communicate a copy of these resolutions to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, and to each of said Senators and Representatives immediately upon the passage of this resolution.

STATE OF RHODE ISLAND,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
PROVIDENCE.

I hereby certify the foregoing to be a true copy of the original resolution approved by his excellency the governor on the 19th day of April, in the year 1917.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of the State of Rhode Island this 25th day of April, in the year 1917.

[SEAL.] J. FRED PARKER,
Secretary of State.

Mr. POINDEXTER presented a petition of sundry citizens of Lind, Wash., pledging support to the President, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HUSTING presented petitions of Council No. 614, Knights of Columbus, of Oshkosh; of the Benefit Society of the Segelke & Kohlhaus Manufacturing Co., of La Crosse; of the Hillside Country Club and the Advancement Association, of Horicon; and of sundry citizens of Prairie du Chien, all in the State of Wisconsin, pledging support to the President, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota presented petitions of the Anti-Saloon League of Roberts County; the congregation of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Irene; the Brotherhood of the First Congregational Church of Sioux Falls; the congregation of the Presbyterian Church of Brookins; the faculty of Augustana College, of Canton; and of sundry citizens of Bruce, Volga, Goodwin, and Mitchell, all in the State of South Dakota, praying for National prohibition during the period of the war, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

LAND IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. POMERENE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 2134) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue a deed to the persons hereinafter named for part of a lot in the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and by unanimous consent the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. HALE:

A bill (S. 2141) for the relief of Lewis Myshrall; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A bill (S. 2153) granting an increase of pension to William W. Findley; to the Committee on Pensions.

MILITARY AND NAVAL ESTABLISHMENTS.

Mr. NORRIS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 3971) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the Military and Naval Establishments on account of war expenses for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CURTIS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 3971) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the Military and Naval Establishments on account of war expenses for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

YEAR'S PROFITS OF ARMOUR & CO.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, on Wednesday last in debate I referred to some figures with reference to the profits of the packing companies, which figures were thought to be exaggerated. I take up the time of the Senate for just a moment to insert a statement, which is found in the Chicago Daily Tribune of January 12, 1917, which purports to be an authorized statement of Armour & Co., and I presume it is, because it is indorsed by an interview given by President J. Ogden Armour at the time.

Armour & Co.'s net earnings, less donations to pension fund, were $20,100,000 in the fiscal year ending October 28, 1916. This is equal to 20 per cent on the present outstanding stock, which was increased during the year from $20,000,000 to $100,000,000. On the basis of stock outstanding at the beginning of 1916 the year's earnings are equal to better than 100 per cent. In 1915, the previous best year, earnings were 55 per cent, the net standing at $11,000,000.

I simply put that into the RECORD to substantiate the statement which I made on a previous day.

ARMY APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT (S. DOC. NO. 15).

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire at this time to submit the following conference report on the Army appropriation bill, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

The conference report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 17, 18, 22, 24, 32, 33, 34, 41, 49, 56, 58, 60, 64, 79, 85, 88, 89, 90, 91, 94, 96, 97, 107, 108, 109, 110, 111, 112, 115, 119, 120, 124, 130, 131, and 135.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 9, 10, 11, 12, 14, 15, 19, 20, 21, 23, 28, 30, 31, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 42, 43, 44, 45, 47, 48, 51, 52, 55, 57, 61, 63, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72, 74, 75, 76, 77, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 86, 87, 92, 93, 98, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 106, 113, 116, 117, 118, 127, 132, 133, and 134, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 13, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 1 of said amendment strike out the word "hereafter"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 16, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the amount stricken out by said amendment in lieu of the amount inserted by said amendment; in line 15 of said amendment, after the word "Scouts" and the comma, insert the following: "between the ages of 21 and 34 years"; and on line 19 of the same amendment strike out the word "thirty" and insert the word "thirty-four"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 25, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "$2,437,272"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 26, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert "$1,070,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 27, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert "$100,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 29, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 3 of said amendment, after the word "amended," insert the following: "for the period of the existing emergency"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 46, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert "$18,500,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 50, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert "$13,450,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 53, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert "$2,000,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 54, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "Provided, That section 1120 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, repealed"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 59, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert "$16,000,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 62, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert "$28,640,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 71, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 3 of said amendment strike out the words "exceeding one thousand five hundred" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "less than one thousand one hundred and eighty"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 73, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Add, after the amount, in line 5 of said amendment, the following: ", to remain available until June 30, 1919"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 78, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment; on page 42 of the bill, in line 5, after the word "buildings," insert the words "needed for vocational training in agriculture"; and in line 4 of said amendment strike out the word "regiment" and in lieu thereof insert the words "or more and not exceeding three regiments"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 95, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert "$5,000,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 99, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 1 of said amendment strike out the word "hereafter"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 105, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment, and on page 61 of the bill, in line 12, after the amount "$2,000,000," insert the following: ": Provided, That not exceeding $125,000 of said sum shall be available for procurement by purchase or condemnation of lands in the Eastern and Western Departments for encampments and ranges for Field Artillery of the Regular Army and the National Guard"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 114, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment and transpose the same to follow line 15 on page 63 of the bill; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 121, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Add the following proviso: ": Provided, That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, out of this appropriation, to pay to persons designated by him for training as officers in the Army during the period of their training the sum of not to exceed $100 per month in addition to the allowances authorized by said section 54: Provided, That they shall agree to accept appointment in the Officers' Reserve Corps in such grade as may be tendered by the Secretary of War"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 122, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 1 of said amendment, after the word "Provided," insert the word "further"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 123, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 1 of said amendment, after the word "War," insert the following: "in his discretion"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 125, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2 of said amendment strike out the word "and" and insert the word "or"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 126, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "Provided further, That members of the Officers' Reserve Corps who are in the employ of the United States Government or of the District of Columbia and who are ordered to duty by proper authority shall, when relieved from duty, be restored to the positions held by them when ordered to duty"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 128, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "Provided further, That any former officer of the Regular Army, the Volunteer Army, the Organized Militia, or the National Guard under the age of 64 years, and who has resigned or been honorably discharged from the service after a total commissioned service of not less than three years in either the Regular Army, the Volunteer Army, the Organized Militia, or the National Guard, may, upon such examination and within such age limits as may be prescribed by the President, be appointed and commissioned, in the discretion of the President, in any appropriate arm, staff corps, department, or section of the Officers' Reserve Corps, with rank not more than one grade higher than any previously held by the officer in either of said forces, but in no case above that of lieutenant colonel"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 129, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out by said amendment insert the following: "Provided further, That the following language of section 5 of the act of June 3, 1916, entitled 'An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes,' to wit: 'Not more than one-half of all of the officers detailed in said corps shall at any time be stationed, or assigned to or employed upon any duty, in or near the District of Columbia,' be amended so as to authorize the President to suspend the operation of the same during the existing emergency"; and the Senate agree to the same.

RECESS.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m., Friday, May 4, 1917) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, May 5, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 4, 1917.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Let Thy blessing descend upon us, O Lord God our Heavenly Father, and guide us to a successful end in all our worthy undertakings. To whom much has been given, of him much shall be required. For whatever is worth having is worth defending. We thank Thee for the wave of patriotism sweeping through our land, and we pray that its manifestations may prove worthy of brave and noble men; that we may stand together for all that is nearest and dearest to our hearts; that the progress of civilization may continue until all that is best in life may be fulfilled in all the nations of the earth for the betterment of mankind in spite of every untoward effort, for Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory, forever, amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ESPIONAGE.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the committees.

The Clerk called the committees, and when the Committee on the Judiciary was called,

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 291, the espionage bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina calls up the bill of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 291) to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Minnesota to use the remainder of his time, for we shall have only one more speech on our side.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota makes the point of no quorum, and evidently no quorum is present.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were closed, and the Sergeant at Arms was directed to notify absent Members.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Scully	Sterling, Pa.	Voigt

The SPEAKER. On this call 336 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. LITTLEPAGE, for five days, on account of important business.

To Mr. STRONG, for three days, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. DRANE, for to-day, on account of important business.

ESPIONAGE.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I may not occupy the entire 10 minutes, having spoken the other day upon the bill. I propose in these remarks to confine myself to the discussion of section 4 of title 1. You all doubtless know that there are four amendments—or, rather, three amendments and a motion to strike out the section—pending at this time. One amendment is that offered by the chairman of the committee having this bill in charge. Another amendment is the one offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] and the last one is the one offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK]. There are three amendments and then the motion presented by myself to strike section 4 from the bill.

I rise for the purpose of advocating the adoption of the amendment to strike out, and I do so upon two grounds: First, the section is so worded at present that it is full of peril to the liberties of this country; second, that not one of the proposed amendments will remove the difficulties that exist in this section. Hence, logically, the only thing to do is to strike the section from the bill, and this can be done without imperiling the validity of the remaining sections of this measure. Taking out section 4 will not interfere with the enforcement of the entire remaining portion of the bill. So that a Member in voting can confine his thought and attention to the one single question: Am I in favor of section 4 as it is written in this bill; has the discussion that has taken place on the floor and my own thought convinced me that it is a questionable measure and ought not to be introduced into this bill and made into law? Upon your conclusion in that respect you can vote upon this single paragraph without hesitation.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], in a question, called attention to one defect there is in the measure as it is written. I refer to the words "or communicating." They are utterly too broad to remain with safety in the bill. And yet there is no amendment pending that would strike those words out of the proposed law.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will yield, there is an amendment pending for that very purpose.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I accept the gentleman's statement that there is an amendment pending in regard to that particular word. If so, it is a much-needed amendment, and the striking out of the word "communicating" will make one step toward improving the text of section 4. "Communicating" is fraught with peril to innocent citizens. It would interfere with you or me if an order were issued by proclamation declaring that certain lines were forbidden; it would prevent us from communicating with each other concerning it and the citizens of the country from discussing it as a question of policy, and it ought not to exist.

Another objection lies in the words "in his judgment." As our Speaker said in discussing this measure, it is not one presented solely for the administration of Mr. Wilson, it is one to be a law upon the statute books for all coming time until repealed by the Congress of the United States. "In his judgment" has this result: That when he declares that in his judgment certain subjects are prohibited, they are removed from the trial of the cause, and the question submitted to the jury would be not whether these things so prohibited were such as might be useful to the enemy but whether or not the man charged with the offense had simply published or communicated something concerning the subject matter of the proclamation.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I can not yield. I have not the time. Every lawyer knows that what I say is true, that on the trial there would be only the proof of the proclamation and the proof of the violation of the terms of the proclamation in order to make a man guilty and compel the court to charge the jury that the case had been made out against him. Again, the proviso that is added to this section, that nothing in this section shall be construed to limit or restrict any discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives, or the publication of the same, is placed there for the purpose of avoiding the constitutional objection that is made against the section. Does it accomplish that fact? Does it bring this section into compliance with the requirements of the Constitution of the United States?

How can a person discuss a matter that has been prohibited without referring to the thing that has been prohibited? And if he is given liberty to discuss that, then the prior portion of the section is utterly valueless and of no effect. Why then attempt to enact such a provision?

The amendments which have been offered all point in one direction, and all of them involve one single proposition, couched in various terms and in differing language, but they all point toward the accomplishment of one thing, to wit, they are intended to put into the section an enumeration of the things that are to be prohibited; or, I might rather say, they are intended to put into the section an enumeration of the things that are to be made the subject of prohibition by the President. I submit that you can not enumerate in such general terms as to make the enumeration of any service without clothing the individual who has the right to judge with a discretionary power that is inimical to the welfare of the Republic. I say to the Members of this House, it is far better to strike this section from the bill than to attempt by a patchwork that is unsatisfactory at the best to amend it or try to perfect it. Let us take the people of the country into our confidence in the management and handling and conduct of their war.

The people of the country are the sovereigns in this land, and they have a right to know about their own war, the war to which they will have to contribute the means and the men, and make the sacrifices that will bring the conflict to a right conclusion. Any attempt to hamper, any attempt to prevent proper communication, any attempt to prevent the right interchange of thought, is an attempt that will be productive of ill and can not accomplish any good.

I wish to have this section stricken from the law because of these manifold objections to its text, because its purposes can not be accomplished without injury to the cause.

During the entire Civil War, when there was danger of the communication and publication of evil things, there was never such a bill as this attempted to be put upon the statute books of our country. Why should we attempt it now? Let us make this piece of otherwise useful legislation valuable to the country and valuable to the administration by striking out section 4 and passing the rest of it with such amendments as you may deem proper to make it perfect. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that this section should be stricken out. I believe the proper course to pursue is to make such amendments thereto as are wise and necessary. I believe I speak for the entire Judiciary Committee when I say that it is not averse to any amendment that will improve the bill. In my opinion the majority of the committee is opposed to striking out the section.

The gentleman says that this section is dangerous to the interests of the people. Why, the very object and intention of this section is to protect the interests of the people.

There are four provisions in the Constitution to which I wish to make reference. First, the President is Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy; second, the Constitution says Congress shall have power to provide for the common defense and the general welfare; third, Congress is prohibited from abridging the freedom of the press; fourth, Congress is given power to enact all laws which are necessary to carry into execution the foregoing provisions. The provision in the Constitution which gives Congress the power to provide for the common defense and the general welfare stands upon an equal footing with the prohibition against abridging the freedom of the press. The argument presented by the gentleman who preceded me [Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania] is that Congress can not provide for the common defense and the general welfare if by so doing we shall in any way restrict the publication of any news or information concerning the national defense. In other words, he stands for the enforcement of one provision of the Constitution, and he appeals to you to ignore the other portion of the Constitution.

Now, the President is Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, and as such officer, under the Constitution, his power is supreme. This section does not in any way give the President additional power so far as he has power to restrict and limit the giving out of information concerning the Army and the Navy or the national defense. It in no way gives him any additional power. The President now is in a way conducting a censorship. In time of peace, and above all in time of war, the President has the power and it is his duty to restrict information given to the public when, in his judgment, that information would be detrimental to the cause of our Army and Navy. This section does not give him any additional power in that respect. The only thing it does is to provide a penalty to deter men from publishing information which, in the interest of the public good, should not be published.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MORGAN. I will yield to my colleague; yes.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Do you not believe that any newspaper that publishes anything injurious to the United States can be prosecuted under section 2 of this act?

Mr. MORGAN. I am not so certain about that. I think it is very doubtful.

Now, what is the liberty of the press? I read from Words and Phrases Judicially Defined, volume 5:

Judge Cooley, in speaking of the constitutional provisions relating to liberty of speech and of the press, says: "We understand 'liberty of speech and of the press' to imply not only liberty to publish but complete immunity from legal censure and punishment for the publication, so long as it is not harmful in its character, when tested by such standards as the law affords."

Again—

"Liberty of the press" as used in the provision of the Federal Constitution guaranteeing the liberty of the press, etc., means a right in the conductor of a newspaper to print whatever he chooses without any previous license, but subject to be held responsible therefor to exactly the same extent that anyone else would be responsible for the publication.

Again—

The liberty of the press was said by Blackstone to consist "in laying no previous restraints upon publication, and not in freedom from censure for a criminal matter when published. Every freeman has an undoubted right to lay what sentiments he pleases before the public. To forbid this is to destroy the freedom of the press, but if he publishes what is improper, mischievous, or illegal he must take the consequences of his own temerity."

Clearly, the freedom of the press under the Constitution does not mean that one is entitled to absolute freedom to publish what he pleases. If his publication injures an individual, he must respond in damages, and in many cases he may be indicted for criminal libel; and in no State of the Union is an editor or a publisher given absolute immunity from punishment for what he publishes; he is held responsible. Under all of the precedents of the past and in every State of the Union an editor or a publisher is responsible for injuring an individual; and yet you stand here and say that a publication that injures the Nation, that injures the whole public, that endangers the safety of the Nation, that may affect the success of our Army and Navy, and yet we are powerless, under the Constitution, to place any restriction upon him or hold him responsible. If it is not an abridgement of the freedom of the press to hold a man responsible for injuring an individual, in the name of my country, I ask, how is it an abridgement of the press to hold an editor responsible when he injures the public at large? How is it any abridgement of the freedom of the press if we place a restriction upon him as to such publication? I appeal to you and ask you, if this section is not in the proper language, to amend it, and, if it is necessary, stay here another day and give such attention to this section as will perfect it and enable the Government in this emergency, when we are engaged in war, to have some restriction and some limitation placed upon editors and publishers who might in time of war take advantage of the people and make publications that might be injurious. If we restrict editors in their publications respecting individuals, then for a far greater reason we should restrict them when the interests of the entire Nation is at stake.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DECKER). The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the question to my mind now is whether or not you gentlemen value the lives of the boys of our coming Army and Navy who must cross the ocean to fight in France, and their safety, more than you do the giving to the press of our country absolute liberty to publish whatever they may see fit and proper.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. No; not in five minutes. The question is that, and it can not be anything else. The reputable newspapers of our country, with very few exceptions, are not asking gentlemen to refuse to pass this amendment. I have not received any requests from the reputable newspapers of my district, and I have five of the great daily papers published in my district. Not one of them is sending any objections to this bill and to this section. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] is one of the able and distinguished members of the Committee on the Judiciary of this House. This section was debated and considered for weeks and weeks in the Committee on the Judiciary. Every member of that committee had free and full opportunity to offer suggestions and to correct this amendment, but here to-day he comes and advocates not the correction of this section, he advocates not what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] suggests, namely, the amending of this section—and I might say that it will meet with the approval of many members of the committee to amend it so that it will be known exactly what shall not be published pertaining to the movement of ships or the movement of soldiers—but he comes here and advocates the striking out of the section altogether.

Suppose that some person who may not be a newspaper man obtains information as to the departure of thousands of our boys on transports to Europe to fight, and suppose that information is published, be it in the newspaper or not, and it becomes known to the enemy and they are able to sink those transports and drown those boys. Will you gentlemen who are standing here to-day and saying, do not make any law upon this subject at all, then feel that you have done your duty to your country as you ought to do it in this hour? Gentlemen, the President of the United States is entitled to your absolute and unconditional support in this measure. He is responsible to the people of this country. The press is not responsible to the people of this country for the conduct of this war. It is placed in the hands of the President, the Commander in Chief, and I ask you to give to him authority to say when matters should not be published that would be of benefit to the enemy. That is all that we ask.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. MCCORMICK. The gentleman is responsible to the people of his district, is he not? If the gentleman were to discover that an epidemic of an infectious disease among the naval recruits was gravely serious and that adequate steps were not being taken to stamp it out, would he feel justified then in proclaiming the facts, in violation of the law?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, there would not be any objection to that. There would be nothing in this bill to prevent the publication of such news. There is specific provision stating at the end of this section that a newspaper shall be permitted to publish news about the management or mismanagement of the Army or the Navy.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, that free speech and a free press are absolutely essential to the maintenance of a free government is axiomatic, and the fathers of the Republic were so fully alive to that tremendously important fact that they placed in the Constitution a provision, clear, definite, and specific, against the abridgment of free speech or a free press. The section now under discussion, either in its present form or in any form proposed by the amendments before us, would fly squarely in the face of that constitutional provision and would greatly endanger the liberties of the people by abridging the rights of free speech and of a free press. I am, therefore, in favor of striking the section out. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I believe we are all in favor of free speech and a free press, and we ought to guard that carefully. I do not believe that the section in question authorizes any violation of that right at all.

There is nothing in that section itself that impinges upon that right in any way; it does, however, give to the President the power to determine that certain matters shall not be published, but we have a right to assume that the President will obey the Constitution. Let me remind this House that we have voted in favor of war and that we have voted in favor of compelling the boys to go into the trenches to fight our battles here and abroad. When we did that we placed upon the President the greatest possible responsibility, infinitely greater than any that we propose to confer on him by this bill. We are asked now to give to him the power to protect our soldiers from treachery at home. I can not understand how anyone can insist that the power necessary to protect them should not be given simply because somebody contends that free speech in some fashion may be infringed. I have talked with a number of old soldiers who served in the Civil War. They have told me that in many instances information published in one section or another crossed the line and was very detrimental to this Government in carrying on that war. Are we going to permit the same during this war? The other sections of this bill do not cover this matter at all. As I called attention in speaking on this bill a couple of days ago, the first section relates to obtaining information, not to publishing or communicating it. The second covers communications directly to an enemy, and the third applies to officers or others who are intrusted with information, prohibiting those people from turning the information into channels where it may reach the enemy. There is a great deal of information that may be of value to an enemy, and if you permit its publication it is evident it will reach our enemies. A newspaper, for instance, published in New York might describe fortifications, or publish the movement of ships or troops. This newspaper may go onto some foreign vessel or across the Mexican border from which they may reach Germany.

Suppose the Germans know that we have a ship laden with troops for France or Belgium or any other section? If they can have that information they will profit by it. The natural thing will be to prepare to sink it just as they did the Lusitania. The Germans knew when the Lusitania sailed and announced they would sink it and did sink it. Ought we not pass some law to restrain our people from publishing facts that will aid our enemies in sinking other ships with their cargoes of soldiers? We should not put our soldiers or sailors in a position where they are at the mercy of those who are not loyal among us. It is idle and utterly foolish to insist that our newspapers are all going to be loyal and eager to protect our national interests. We know there are numbers of people among us who are not loyal to us. Many of them are actually German soldiers. I am told there are 30,000 German reservists recorded at one consulate in the United States. With that number here, can you hope to keep the secrets we ought to keep from reaching the enemy if we permit everybody to publish anything that they may see fit? Why should we be so tender about the press, that we are willing to imperil the safety of our own military operations not to offend it? I have an amendment which I desire to offer, which I think will obviate most of the difficulties that have been suggested, and I ask that it be read in my time for the information of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota in his time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. VOLSTEAD: At the end of section 4, page 36, insert the following:

"Provided further, That the effect that any information may have upon the morale of the United States, its enemy, or the armed forces of either, shall not be considered in determining whether any information is of value to the enemy but only information which might be of direct use to the enemy in directing operations of the war shall be so considered, and the question whether the information is of such character shall in prosecutions under this section be submitted to the jury for its determination."

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I believe that if that amendment were added to the section so that it will relate only to information that will be of use to the enemy in carrying on military operations the power of the President would be greatly limited. To make doubly sure that the President shall not make any unreasonable restrictions on the press, I leave it to the jury to determine whether the information he condemns is of such a character that it would be injurious to the country. It seems to me if that amendment is adopted no one need hesitate to vote for this section. I feel that in this emergency we can not afford to play politics; that it is our duty to stand by the administration. We are appropriating millions of dollars and raising millions of troops and we must not hesitate to protect those troops. We must not hesitate to protect the interests of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], a member of the committee, has seen fit, after assisting in the perfection of the amendment in the committee and without voicing any objection to it there, should move to strike out the section from the bill on the floor of the House. And I should regret very much if this House——

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit an interrogatory?

Mr. WEBB. Just a question.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I want to ask the chairman what the doings in the committee have to do with the perfected language of the bill? And in that connection I wish also to ask him whether I did not request, if it were possible, that the committee should not meet on the following Monday, when this bill was reported, but meet on the following Tuesday, so that I might be present to reconsider the whole bill? Is not that the fact?

Mr. WEBB. I do not remember that, Mr. Speaker; and, in fact, I do not care to say what took place in the committee, but it was my understanding all along that there was only one member of the Committee on the Judiciary who objected to section 4, and that was the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], who, in the committee, notified the committee that he was opposed to it and would oppose it on the floor of the House.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think it is treasonable that a member of the committee objects to the bill as reported to the House?

Mr. WEBB. I was stating that I regretted that a member of the committee who seemed to favor the section in the committee and help draft it should, on the floor of the House, move to strike the section from the bill. As I started to say, I hope very much that the House in this great crisis, the greatest this country has ever encountered from its beginning, when, if there ever was a time in its history that it is supremely important to keep information that is useful to the enemy from being published throughout the broad land, where there are so many hundreds of thousands of alien sympathizers with the enemy, will not strike this section out of the bill entirely. Every man who is sitting before me should realize that in a time like this there ought to be some restrictions upon the publication of those things concerning the vital interests of our national defense, and which, if communicated to the enemy by such publication, would be detrimental to our defense and helpful to the enemy.

If you strike this section out of the bill many thousands of newspapers of the country, many of them published in foreign languages, many published by alien enemies, many by foreign sympathizers, will be turned loose to publish in this country for the benefit of every spy and every sympathizer with our common enemy things concerning the most vital part of our Government, namely, the national defense, and that information can be transmitted to the enemy and taken advantage of when we come to do our part of the fighting.

Mr. DILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. For a question only.

Mr. DILL. Are they not now free to do that?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; they are free to do that now. That is, the honorable newspapers have agreed to publish only certain things, but that is a gentleman's agreement. They have volunteered to do that. Others will not adhere to the agreement. I am in favor of conscripting them and making them do it. [Applause.] There are many newspapers of this country that have not entered that agreement and which at the first opportunity will violate the agreement that only a few of the newspapers of the country have made. This amendment——

Mr. HULBERT. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. WEBB. I regret that I can not yield just now.

This amendment I have offered gives the President power from time to time by proclamation to designate the character of information that in his opinion would be useful to the enemy if published, and then the Congress prohibits its publication. This will hurt no honest newspaper man; will hurt no patriotic publisher of a newspaper. Therefore that kind of newspaper ought not to object to it and all other kinds ought to be made to stand by such a provision.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. REAVIS. I would like to have the gentleman's opinion regarding the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD], making the issue as to whether the information was of such a character as might be useful to the enemy one of fact to be determined by a jury rather than depending upon the President's proclamation.

Mr. WEBB. Yes; you might have our Government destroyed before a jury trial ever took place.

Mr. SHERLEY. Was not that the real crux of the fight that was made in regard to the old English libel laws—the fight Erskine made against Mansfield?

Mr. WEBB. I do not remember.

Mr. SHERLEY. You ought to know about it.

Mr. WEBB. The gentleman may know, but I do not. I know what we have before us now. I am talking of the necessities of the present, not what took place long ago.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], who moves to strike out this section, in his speech yesterday declared he thought this section was constitutional, and undoubtedly the amendment which the committee has offered has removed all objection, technical constitutional objection, that some may have to the section.

Before proceeding further I will read from Field against Clark just a few statutes which are in line with the amendment which I was authorized by the committee yesterday to offer. In 1794 the Congress gave authority to the President to lay an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports of the United States, as follows: "Whenever, in his opinion, the public safety shall so require," and under regulations to be continued or revoked "whenever he shall think proper."

That is the language of the statute. By the act of February 9, 1789, the President was given the power to remit and discontinue for the time being the restraint on exportations which Congress had proscribed with respect to commercial intercourse with the French Republic if he should "deem it expedient and consistent with the interests of the United States."

Now, gentlemen of the House, there are probably a hundred cases of that sort in the statutes of the United States where, as the court has said, it is absolutely necessary to leave some administrative duty to the Chief Executive or the heads of departments. The amendment which the committee has offered is absolutely in line with that long list of statutes from 1799 down to the present time, as cited in the case of Field against Clark and in the Grimaud case on down, so that the House need have no scruple in voting for the amendment on the ground that it is not constitutional.

But even if it is not unconstitutional from that standpoint—that is, that the President may designate from time to time the character of information that may be useful to the enemy—admitting that that is constitutional, the next objection, as they say, is that we have no right to abridge the freedom of the press. We have heard a great deal of beautiful oratory about the freedom of speech and of the press. We have heard a great deal of beautiful oratory about the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, but every one of us can have our life taken from us and our happiness disturbed in certain cases by the supreme law of the land.

Now, Judge Story is a very good authority on the freedom of the press, and I want to read a few words from him on that point:

> There is a good deal of loose reasoning on the subject of the liberty of the press, as if its individuality were constitutionally such that, like the King of England, it could do no wrong and was free from every inquiry and afforded a perfect sanctuary for every abuse; that, in short, it implied a despotic sovereignty to every sort of wrong, without the slightest accountability to private or public justice.

That is the position to-day. Men have argued here almost to the extreme limit to the effect that whatever the press does, it can do no wrong. I deny that any such power rests in any organization or institution in this country, high or low, from the President to the humblest citizen. Is it going to be contended here to-day that in time of war everybody must have a master except the newspapers of the country. [Applause.] I read further:

> Such a notion is too extravagant to be held by any sound constitutional lawyer with regard to the rights and duties belonging to governments generally or to the State governments in particular. If it were admitted to be correct it might be justly affirmed that the liberty of the press was incompatible with the permanent existence of any free government.

I read still further from this great judge:

> Besides, what is meant by restraint of the press or an abridgment of its liberty? If to publish without control or responsibility be its genuine meaning, is not that equally violated by allowing a private compensation for damages, as by a public fine? Is not a man as much restrained from doing a thing by the fear of heavy damages as by public punishment? Is he not often as severely punished by one as by the other? Surely it can make no difference in the case what is the nature or extent of the restraint, if all restraint is prohibited. The legislative power is just as much prohibited from one mode as from another. And it may be asked, where is the ground for distinguishing between public and private amenability for the wrong? The prohibition itself states no distinction. It is general; it is universal. Why, then, is the distinction attempted to be made? Plainly, because of the monstrous consequences flowing from such a doctrine. It would prostrate all personal liberty, all private peace, all enjoyment of property, and good reputation. These are the great objects for which government is instituted; and if the licentiousness of the press must endanger not only these but all public rights and public liberties, is it not as plain that the right of government to punish the violators of them—the only mode of redress which it can pursue—flows from the primary duty of self-preservation? No one can doubt the importance, in a free government, of a right to canvass the acts of public men and the tendency of public measures, to censure boldly the conduct of rulers, and to scrutinize closely the policy and plans of the Government. This is the great security of a free government. If we would preserve it public opinion must be enlightened; political vigilance must be inculcated; free, but not licentious, discussion must be encouraged. But the exercise of a right is essentially different from an abuse of it. The one is no legitimate inference from the other. Common sense here promulgates the broad doctrine, sic utere tuo, ut non alienum lædas; so exercise your own freedom as not to infringe the rights of others or the public peace and safety.

Now, gentlemen of the House, has not this Congress, has not this Government, the right to preserve its own existence by prohibiting the newspapers of the country from publishing secrets that are of vital importance to that very existence? I do not think any lawyer in this House will contend that we have not the power, in an effort to preserve the very life of this Government, to prohibit the publication in the public press of this country of those things which are vitally connected with our national defense, and which, if made public, would be carried to the enemy, and therefore would destroy or tend to destroy the very Government under which we operate to-day. The Congress has the power to raise armies. There is no section in the Constitution that gives us the right explicitly to gather up men by conscription. The word "conscription" or "draft" can not be found in the Constitution. And yet under the power of Congress to raise armies and to provide for the national defense we send the heavy hand of the law throughout this broad land and lay it on the shoulder of every mother's boy and say, "You must give up your liberties and come into the Army and fight for the national defense and for the existence of the Government."

No; there is no place in the Constitution which says you can make an express provision giving Congress the power to prohibit the publication of these national-defense secrets which are helpful to the enemy and hurtful to our country, except under the implied power of the Constitution, the power to raise armies and maintain them, the power to declare war; and, in fact, under the eighteenth paragraph of the eighth section of the Constitution, which says in substance that the Congress shall have power to pass all laws needful to carry out the objects and purposes of the Constitution. That gives us the power to defend the Government against destruction, and that is all that is aimed at in this section, to prevent the enemy with whom we are now at war from coming into possession of the vital secrets concerning our national defense.

Now, gentlemen of the House, after all, the fight against this bill has been made by a newspaper propaganda. I saw in a New York newspaper, whose columns have been quoted in this debate three or four times, several days ago that the editor had sent over the country 1,000 telegrams, asking expressions against "the infamous spy bill," and, of course, he got a good many. But right here, in a paper handed to me a while ago, is an illustration of what ought not to be published at this time, and yet it is published in a paper whose editorials are denouncing this morning any restriction on the liberty and freedom of the press to publish whatever it pleases. It says, "To sink U boats at their bases" is the proper campaign to wage against their menace. Is there any doubt but what that information will be gotten to the enemy? It ought not to be published. Yet it is published in a paper that is demanding wide-open license to publish whatever it pleases at a time when our country is in danger.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. BOOHER. I agree thoroughly with the gentleman's position. Has the gentleman no censure for that member of the War Board that gave that secret away? Some member of that board must have given it away.

Mr. WEBB. I agree to that, my friend, and that is the trouble about these volunteer censorships. You can not always make them stick to their volunteering. You must have the heavy hand of the law to restrain the fellow who wants to violate the section, who wants to kick out of the volunteer censorship, and who is willing, if need be, in order to exercise that licentious liberty of the press, to scatter information to the four winds and let the enemy get it and possibly destroy his own country thereby. [Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEBB. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if he does not think that the President could exercise a censorship over the newspapers in the same way in which he does it over the cable and telegraph companies by an Executive order, under the authority of the Constitution and the declaration of war.

Mr. WEBB. Oh, I think not.

Mr. WALSH. Why not?

Mr. WEBB. I think if he should undertake to do that you would want to impeach him probably. In a life and death struggle between this country and another country we have the right to say that no newspaper shall publish those secrets which are necessary and vital to our own life. Why not say it like men and not allow a few newspapers to browbeat us. And it is only a few that are trying to do it and to drive us into this position just because they want the license to publish what they please. These very same newspapers, many of them, for the last six months and longer have been crying from one end of this country to the other, "Stand by the President!" When the McLemore resolution was up they said, "Stand by the President. He knows," and we stood by him, and the newspapers told us to do it. When it came to arming merchant ships the newspapers said, "Stand by the President. He knows." And we did stand by him. Then, when we broke off diplomatic relations with Germany, these same newspapers cried, "Stand by the President. He is Commander in Chief. He knows." Then, when it came to the declaration of war, these very same newspapers declared that any man who did not stand by the President, because he knew, was practically a traitor to his country; and we stood by him. Then, when it came to raising an army with which to wage the war, which the newspapers themselves had more to do with bringing on than any other agency in the world, they said, "Stand by the President, and go to every home in the land and take the flesh and blood that has been raised with infinite pains and patience and compel the boys to join the Army to fight this war. Stand by the President. He knows," was their cry. But now, when we ask them to stand by the President and trust him, they say, "We will not do it." [Applause.]

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I yield for a question.

Mr. RANDALL. Does not the gentleman approve of the latest act of the press in becoming a little independent?

Mr. WEBB. That is not it. I do not like to have a crowd of newspapers or a crowd of people tell this Congress incessantly, day in and day out, to stand by the President when they will not do it themselves when their interest is involved. The paper I had here a moment ago has been doing that every day and every hour for the last six months or a year and branding men with the traitor's mark who do not stand by the President. Now, when we call upon the editor of that paper to stand by the President he says, "I will not do it, because you are going to take some of my liberties away." [Applause.] I think it is time for this House to assert a little independence of the newspapers of this country, especially certain newspapers that try to control the independent action of this great body. I want to say to the newspapers of the country and to say to the House, and maybe they will see their duty when I make it so positive, that not two hours ago I received a message from the President of the United States, the Commander in Chief of all the armies of a million boys that with your vote and mine we are going to raise and put in the trenches and fight for the glory and the defense of this country. The President sent me word and asked me to say to the House that the principle of this section 4 is absolutely necessary to the defense and success of this country in this war. [Applause.]

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEBB. I yield for a question.

Mr. NORTON. Was that message taken down to you by the Postmaster General, Mr. Burleson, who again has been snooping around the House Office Building and the Capitol this morning?

Mr. WEBB. I do not think the gentleman ought to make observations of that kind. I got the message directly from the President of the United States, the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy, and the man into whose hands the gentleman voted to turn over a million boys of this country. Is it possible that when you go back home you are going to say to the mothers and fathers, "I trusted Woodrow Wilson sufficiently to turn over to him a million of the noblest boys in the world, to send to their life or their death, wherever he might say, but I was not willing to take from the newspapers of the country the privilege of publishing information which might be gotten to the enemy and make it easier for them to destroy those boys." [Applause.] Oh, yes; I am tired of double dealing and hypocrisy.

If it is good to stand by the President in all those great things that we have been doing for the last few months, the newspapers ought to come across and stand by him now. When one day the newspapers call on us to stand by the President and the next day they say, "Don't you do it"—one day they tell us "if you don't stand by him you are a traitor" and the next day "if you do stand by him you are a traitor"—they remind me in their inconsistency of a story of the old farmer down in Virginia who had a pack of dogs. Among them was a greyhound. He went out one day to hunt rabbits, and the greyhound, as you know, runs by sight and not by scent. A rabbit was hopped, and the pack took off after the rabbit, and the greyhound bounded out far ahead of the rest of the pack. Suddenly he collided with perpendicular strand of a barbed-wire fence, which slit him open from nose to tail. The old farmer ran up, saw the plight of his dog, gathered up the two parts, carried them home, and laid them in the kennel. The next morning he went out for the purpose of burying the pride of his pack, but to his great surprise he found the dog was still living, but was horrified to find that in putting the two halves together he had put the tail part where the head ought to be and the head part where the tail ought to be. Notwithstanding this condition, by what the doctors call the osmose and the endosmose the parts began to adhere and grow together, and a week or two later one of the farmer's friends said, "Bill, how is that dog getting along that was split in two the other day out in your pasture?" "Why," he said, "he is fine. He is by all odds the best dog in the pack." "How is that?" "Well, it is this way, that dog can run both ways and bark at each end." [Laughter.] So these papers that for six months have been echoing and reechoing the cry, "Stand by the President," on everything that they want done, now, when we want them to stand by the President, say, "No; we will not do it."

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEBB. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Are the newspapers of the country in a class by themselves? Does the Constitution recognize them as having any greater rights than the citizens? Are they more patriotic than the citizens of the United States? Should they be exempt from reasonable control?

Mr. WEBB. Some of them seem to think that they are in a class by themselves and possess privileges that no one else does. Yes, gentlemen of the House, this great man up in the White House that some here seem to be afraid to trust, to him we have voted not only the control of a million boys of the country, but we have voted $7,000,000,000 into his hands to distribute almost as he sees fit. Seven billion dollars! A sum of money by a billion dollars larger than there is gold in the entire world. It would take 12,000 horses to pull it; a line of horses 35 miles long; 250 freight cars loaded to their capacity—and yet every one of us voted to turn this stupendous amount of money over to the President of the United States; and yet we can not trust him to restrain the newspapers of the country from publishing news that would be destructive of our Government and helpful to the enemy. Let us not be so inconsistent.

Mr. CHARLES B. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. CHARLES B. SMITH. Is it not a fact that the gentleman is slightly wrong in the assumption that Members of the House are opposed to restraining the newspapers? Is it not a fact that we are opposed to this particular way of restraining them? We want to get into the law just how and to what extent we will restrain them.

Mr. WEBB. That is exactly what we have done. We propose to restrain them from publishing matters that in the judgment of the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy will be hurtful to this country and helpful to the enemy concerning national-defense matters.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has stated that it would be impossible to frame the exact conditions that would entitle the matter to prohibition. Then if you take away from the President the authority to do it, would it not leave it in the discretion of every man in the country to do it for himself?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; I think the honest newspapers of this country, all of them, are anxious not to publish national-defense secrets that would be helpful to the enemy, but we have dishonest newspapers, like we have dishonest people, and out of 20,000 publications you will find some in sympathy with the enemy who will be happy to publish many things concerning our affairs that would be helpful if communicated to the enemy. And a great many may innocently do it.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. I want to say to the gentleman that what we object to is that when a man is tried as to whether he shall go to jail or not, what we want is not the judgment of the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy, but the judgment of a jury.

Mr. WEBB. If you can not trust the judgment of the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy to say what information ought not to be published, how can you trust him with a million boys?

Mr. LITTLE. That is not the question.

Mr. WEBB. It is the question.

Mr. LITTLE. The Constitution provides that we shall have a trial and verdict by a jury. We are willing to leave to the Commander in Chief the right to command, but we do not want him to usurp the province of the jury.

Mr. WEBB. There is no usurpation of the province of the jury whatever in this section. Trial by jury is absolutely preserved.

Mr. LITTLE. If you had not put that provision in, you would not have had this opposition.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I will yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SHERLEY. One reason why we are willing to trust the Executive with great power is because his exercise of that power may be subject to the discriminating criticism and judgment of the people of the country. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I want to read after that applause what we have put in this bill. Talk about the rights of discrimination and discussion—it was not necessary to write this in the section, but for the sake of those who fear that there was some influence that wanted to strike down the criticism of the press, we have written this into the section:

Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to limit or restrict any discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives or the publication of the same.

Mr. SHERLEY. What we want is to go to the jury with the right to determine not only whether the matter prohibited was published, but whether it was of such a character as would be helpful to the enemy.

Mr. WEBB. Yes; and in this country with all the delays of a jury trial you will find that the country could be destroyed, the forts blown up, and transports sunk before you could get your trial. [Applause.] War is a serious business. You have entered into it, and it takes strong and stern acts in time of war to preserve the country. The gentleman from Kentucky himself made an argument to that effect.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. The very proposition would carry the further proposition that you must submit to the jury the intention—as intention is the gist of the crime—of the intention to violate the spirit of the law. So that every man would be tried not on the question of whether his action was harmful, but whether he intended it to be harmful, and then you would leave it to the fools and the traitors to betray the country.

Mr. SHERLEY. That was the same argument made by the crown when the criminal libel laws were passed, and led to the Fox libel law, which gave to the jury the right to determine the law as well as the fact.

Mr. WEBB. I am sorry that the gentleman did not vouchsafe his knowledge to the Judiciary Committee four or five days ago instead of waiting until this late hour.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. If the newspapers should publish information useful to the enemy, will not that be giving aid and comfort to the enemy, and will not that publisher be guilty of treason, and could not he be punished without this law?

Mr. WEBB. No; he would not. And if you do not put something like this in the law, when trouble breaks loose, when the shooting and killing begins, you are going to turn loose 20,000 newspapers, and every one will rush in to get the first information, the first news, to be published in his paper, while there are thousands of alien enemies in our midst to pick it up and possibly send it to the very enemy we are fighting. The papers may do it innocently, but that does not alter the fact that the information may be used tremendously against our success.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. For a question.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. The gentleman states that the proviso saves the situation by providing that criticism of acts and policies of the Government would not be prohibited. Who is to decide what constitutes acts and policies of the Government and that which is proper to prohibit?

Mr. WEBB. Anybody who knows what an act or a policy is can decide that for himself.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. What effect would that have on the press?

Mr. WEBB. None, in so far as criticism is concerned. The New York American can say just as many things about the President and Congress, and all of the rest of the newspapers can say as many things as they choose.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Suppose the President, in construing this proviso, in the exercise of his discretion, makes a mistake, is there any appeal from his decision?

Mr. WEBB. No appeal, except to public opinion, which can criticize him from one end of the country to the other. That is the way they do with the gentleman and myself when we make mistakes.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. No; I can not yield any further. I am going to conclude now. Gentlemen, when you go back home and tell the people whose boys you have drafted into the Army to wage this great war that you voted $7,000,000,000 of taxes upon them and have done everything to try to make your country successful in war, but tell them you would not vote to keep the newspapers of the country from publishing facts about your national defense, secrets which might protect your boys in foreign fields, or in the trenches, or in transit over the ocean, what do you think they are going to say or think about it? Do you think that you can fool them? Do you think that they will be fooled? No; they will tell you that you ought to treat the newspapers just as you have treated them in a great crisis like this, and require the newspapers, if need be, to make some little sacrifice, to give up some of their boasted rights, as you have taken the liberty of their boys from them. You can not fool the folks on that. It will be just like the negro boy who went down to a livery stable one day dressed up with a red necktie and a hard hat and a pair of creased trousers. He walked into the stable where an overall boy was workin[illegible]d while the dude was standing there something kept i[illegible]y around him, and he said to the overall boy, "What is that flying around me?" The boy who was working said, "That is a green fly." "What does the green fly do?" "Why, it flys around garbage cans and the like of that." "Well," said the negro dude, "I ain't no garbage can, is I?" Do I look like one?" The other boy said, "You don't look like a garbage can to me, but you can't fool a green fly." [Laughter.] So you can not fool the people on this thing when you go home and tell them that you voted to take their liberties and their boys from them when it comes to fighting a great war, but that you balked when it came to taking any of the rights of the newspapers away from them.

Mr. Speaker, it is said there are 30,000 German reservists registered in the city of Chicago alone. There are German sympathizers and Austrian sympathizers throughout the United States, and let us suppose that the first shipload of boys, two or three thousand, were put upon a transport and started across to the foreign fields to fight. Suppose some newspaper then concludes that that is too big a piece of news not to publish and concludes in its own mind that it does not care anything for a voluntary censorship but that it is going to publish it in the newspaper and let the people know what has happened, and it does so, and some one of these many thousand German reservists relays that to Mexico and from Mexico it is wirelessed out to a submarine which lies in wait for the destruction of our boys, which goes out and blows them up, then will you feel any remorse of conscience when you look back and say, "I declined by my vote to prohibit that kind of information being given to the enemy?" We have talked so much about the Lusitania horror. Would that be anything more horrible? And yet it is entirely possible that that thing may happen. You can not control 20,000 newspapers, nor 10,000 of them, by a voluntary censorship; and every publication of that kind would go like the wind, and it may be that thousands upon tens of thousands of our boys may be blown up in midocean because of the transmission of such information.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The McCormick amendment, as I heard it read, provides in express terms that there shall be no publication by newspapers of the country of the movement of troops, of the number of troops, of their location, or anything of that kind.

Mr. WEBB. I understand that.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. In other words, that that provision shall be in the act itself.

Mr. WEBB. I understand that; and if the newspapers want that, I am for it, because it is a broader provision and will limit their "liberties" more than the provision which we have put into the section. If the House wants to adopt that amendment, let them do it.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Would not the provision in this bill that would specifically prohibit the publication of anything relating to the movement of any ship protect all of our rights on the high seas and our boys on the high seas, and yet give to the American public that information to which they are entitled in this great situation that faces them to-day?

Mr. WEBB. No; I do not think it would cover every situation.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Would it not protect the people?

Mr. WEBB. It would give the President the power to cover such situations as he thought were vital, and it strikes me that if the House is willing to give him all this other colossal and stupendous power we ought not to object to giving him that power to keep from the papers those things that are useful to the enemy.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. WEBB. For a question.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from North Carolina that I have in my hand the McCormick amendment.

Mr. WEBB. I heard it read here yesterday and am familiar with it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I think it is exceedingly important——

Mr. WEBB. It will be read from the desk when we vote upon it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will not the gentleman permit it to come in here, so that there can be a discussion of it now?

Mr. WEBB. That was discussed yesterday, and I have stated my opinion, both yesterday and to-day. I say that if the House wants to adopt the McCormick amendment, let them do so; but I hope the House will not strike out this section without putting in something that will give the Commander in Chief the power to protect the armies and the navies of this country from things that would be hurtful to us and useful to the enemy.

Mr. LANGLEY and Mr. McCORMICK rose.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. No; I can not yield. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has five minutes remaining.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes, that he may answer some questions.

Mr. WEBB. I have been answering questions for three or four days.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from North Carolina shall be extended five minutes so that he can answer questions. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, here is the attitude of the honest newspapers of this country on this section, and the power conferred by this section will not hurt the honest man, as I have said before, and the dishonest paper ought to be hurt. This propaganda against this section has been carried on throughout the country to get the newspapers to oppose this bill. The Atlanta Georgian—I believe it is generally understood it is owned by Mr. Hearst—the Atlanta Georgian has been preaching that propaganda in Georgia. It telegraphed to the editor of the Columbus Inquirer-Sun, Columbus, Ga., on May 2, this month, urging him as follows:

INQUIRER-SUN, Columbus, Ga.:

Espionage bill now pending in Congress is, in our opinion, an assault upon the very foundation of our free institutions and freedom of thought and speech. The Georgian wishes to put before Congress the judgment of leading editors of the country on the danger of withholding from the public full knowledge of public affairs, and depriving the press of the right freely to express public opinion.

There is nothing in this section that prohibits the free expression of public opinion, and here is what this editor wired back, Mr. W. H. Tucker, and sent copy to Congressman ADAMSON:

There are times when it is inexpedient for us to exercise our rights. If in a great crisis such as the present the Government deems it wise and prudent for the freedom of the press and of speech to be abridged in order that an infinitely larger freedom may be preserved and perpetuated, then we would in no circumstance interpose a single objection to such abridgment. At times, even in a great democracy such as ours, everything should be subordinated to military necessity.

[Applause.]

That is the way the patriotic newspapers of this country feel, and that is the way this House ought to feel, and, as that was written from Georgia, I can do no better in these circumstances than to quote the epitaph that is graven on the monument of Benjamin H. Hill, which stands in Atlanta, Ga., which says:

He who saves his country saves all things, and all things saved will bless him; but he who lets his country die lets all things die, and all things dying curse him.

[Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment to this section.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, may I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make the same request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. All these amendments to this section are voted on before the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] to strike out the section. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. WEBB——

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the amendment be adopted by striking out the words "or communicate."

Mr. MANN. There has been no such amendment offered yet.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. There has been no such amendment offered. Does the gentleman offer to modify his amendment?

Mr. WEBB. I thought the gentleman from Pennsylvania stated he offered that amendment.

Mr. MANN. It has not been offered notwithstanding it may have been suggested.

Mr. WEBB. Then I ask unanimous consent to modify the committee's amendment by striking out the words "or communicate"—I think it is in line 6—so that the prohibition will be against the publication.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the last amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modification of the Webb amendment: Strike out of the amendment the words "or communicate."

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I believe there is a request for unanimous consent. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman who makes the request whether he has in mind that to publish would include sending a letter and whether it would not be well to insert the words "in a newspaper"——

Mr. WEBB. No; no.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. So that this section could refer to a publication in a newspaper, to a publication by printing. It occurs to me——

Mr. WEBB. No; I do not think anybody ought to write these intensely profound important secrets.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. A soldier in the Army might write to his mother a letter that would state certain facts——

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] to strike out the words "or communicate"?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I object. I have an amendment which I wish to offer.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from North Carolina offered an amendment which is pending. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] offered an amendment to that amendment which is pending; I do not know whether it is strictly an amendment to the amendment, but anyhow it was offered. The gentleman from Illinois, my colleague, offered a substitute for the Webb amendment. Does not the vote first come on the Dempsey amendment?

The SPEAKER. It would, but the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] asks unanimous consent——

Mr. MANN. Objection was made to that. I am trying to fix it so that he can offer it as an amendment.

Mr. WEBB. Is it now in order to move to amend the amendment?

Mr. MANN. You can not move it now because there is an amendment to the amendment pending.

Mr. WEBB. I will do it later, I will say to the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The way it runs is this: Somebody offered an amendment and somebody else offered an amendment to that amendment, and somebody offered a substitute to the amendment to the amendment. The first thing to do is to vote on the amendment to the original amendment. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DEMPSEY: Page 36, lines 1 to 9, inclusive——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, can not we have the original amendment read first?

The SPEAKER. Without objection the original amendment to section 4, offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 36 strike out all after the figure "4" in line 1 down to and including the word "both" in line 11 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"During a war in which the United States is engaged, or during a national emergency threatening war, the President is authorized from time to time to designate by proclamation the character of information concerning the national defense which, in his opinion, would be useful to the enemy, and thereupon it shall be unlawful for any person without proper authority to publish or communicate such information. Whoever violates this section shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 10 years, or both."

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I again renew my request for unanimous consent to strike out of the amendment the words "or communicate."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the committee——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is a vote on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY].

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] to strike out of the amendment the words "or communicate"? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DEMPSEY: Page 36, lines 1 to 9, inclusive, after the word "war," in line 3, strike out the rest of the line and all of line 4; after the word "which," in line 7, strike out "in his judgment"; after the word "enemy," in line 8, insert "is hereby prohibited"; strike out the first three words in line 9, "any such prohibition," and insert in lieu thereof "this section," so that as it is proposed to be amended the section will read:

"SEC. 4. During any national emergency resulting from a war to which the United States is a party, or from threat of such a war, the publishing or communicating of, or the attempting to publish or communicate any information relating to the national defense which is of such character that it is or might be useful to the enemy is hereby prohibited. Whoever violates this section shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 10 years, or both: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to limit or restrict any discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives or the publication of the same.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the substitute offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK].

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute offered by Mr. MCCORMICK: Page 36, section 4, strike out all of line 7 and all of line 8 up to and including the words "to the enemy" and substitute the following: "movement, numbers, description, or disposition of any armed forces, ships, aircraft, or war materials of the United States, or with respect to the plans for the conduct of any naval or military operations, or with respect to any works or measures undertaken for or connected with or intended for the fortification or defense of any place prior to the publication or communication of such facts by the Government directly or by its authority."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the substitute.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Mr. Speaker, that substitute was drawn for the original clause as reported by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

The SPEAKER. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK].

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 101, noes 133.

So the substitute was rejected.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KAHN. Would it be in order now to offer an amendment to strike out and insert?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] has a motion pending to strike out.

Mr. KAHN. My amendment is to strike out and insert.

Mr. MANN. Of course the motion can be offered, but we can not move on it until amendments to perfect the section are disposed of.

The SPEAKER. Of course that is the rule as to voting. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment I wish to offer.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] offers an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HUDDLESTON: Amend the amendment of Mr. WEBB by inserting, after the words "without authority to publish," the words "by printing or circulating any printed matter."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Is debate exhausted on this amendment under the rule?

The SPEAKER. Debate is exhausted on this title.

The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON], just read, to the Webb amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Webb amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the next one.

Mr. KAHN rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from California rise?

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows; but there are a whole lot of amendments here pending to perfect that section, the Chair thinks.

Mr. VOLSTEAD rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Minnesota rise?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. To offer an amendment which was read in my time.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. VOLSTEAD: Add at the end of section 4, page 36, the following:

"Provided further, That the effect that any information may have upon the morale of the United States, its enemy, or the armed forces of either shall not be considered in determining whether any information is of value to the enemy, but only information which might be of direct use to the enemy in directing operations of the war shall be so considered, and the question whether the information is of such character shall in prosecutions under this section be submitted to the jury for its determination."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Volstead amendment just read.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I ask for a division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 69, noes 126.

So the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the next one.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROSE: Page 36, line 9, after the word "shall," insert "upon conviction."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Rose amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that there is an amendment here on the table, offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY], which has already been disposed of by the unanimous consent that was given.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania withdraws it. The Clerk will report the Kahn amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KAHN: Page 36, strike out all of section 4 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 4. During any international emergency resulting from a war to which the United States is a party, or from threat of such a war, the President shall, by proclamation, declare the existence of such an emergency and shall create immediately upon the issuance of such proclamation a board of censors, which said board shall have power to prohibit the publishing or communicating of, or the attempting to publish or communicate, any information relating to national fortifications or the movements or disposition of any armed forces, ships, aircraft, munitions, or war materials of the United States which, in their judgment, is of such character that it is or might be useful to the enemy. Said board of censors shall consist of seven members, as follows:

"One member representing the Department of State, one member who shall be a captain in the Navy, one member who shall be a brigadier general of the Army, and four members who shall be representative newspaper editors, journalists, or publishers in the United States. The appointment of said newspaper editors, journalists, or publishers shall be ratified and confirmed by the Senate, and their compensation shall be $5,000 each per annum during the existence of said national emergency resulting from a war to which the United States is a party.

"Whoever violates such prohibition hereinabove referred to shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 10 years, or both: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to limit or restrict any discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives or the publication of the same."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Kahn motion to strike out and insert.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] to strike out the whole section.

Mr. WEBB. The section as amended.

The SPEAKER. Yes; the section as amended.

Mr. KINCHELOE rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Kentucky rise?

Mr. KINCHELOE. I rise to ask unanimous consent that the Webb amendment as adopted may be read again.

The SPEAKER. The Webb amendment has already been adopted.

Mr. KINCHELOE. The section as amended.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri objects. The Clerk will report the Graham amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania: On page 36, Mr. GRAHAM moves to strike out the whole of section 4.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Graham amendment to strike out section 4.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of the Graham amendment to strike out section 4 will, when their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed to the Graham amendment will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 221, nays 167, answered "present" 1, not voting 43, as follows:

YEAS—221.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call my name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. CLARK of Missouri, and he voted "yea."

So the motion of Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania to strike out section 4 was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. PARKER of New York (for) with Mr. LITTLEPAGE (against).

Mr. HAMILTON of New York (for) with Mr. EAGLE (against).

Mr. ROWLAND (for) with Mr. DEWALT (against).

Mr. COOPER of Ohio (for) with Mr. NEELY (against).

Until further notice:

Mr. GANDY with Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota.

Mr. SEARS with Mr. SMITH of Idaho.

Mr. MCANDREWS with Mr. SANFORD.

Mr. CROSSER with Mr. BACHARACH.

Mr. DOUGHTON with Mr. CAPSTICK.

Mr. DRANE with Mr. CRAGO.

Mr. FLYNN with Mr. GREEN of Iowa.

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina with Mr. HAYES.

Mr. KEY of Ohio with Mr. KELLEY of Michigan.

Mr. MARTIN of Illinois with Mr. KREIDER.

Mr. MOON with Mr. MCCULLOCH.

Mr. PRICE with Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania.

Mr. ROBINSON with Mr. MORIN.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD with Mr. PORTER.

Mr. STERLING of Pennsylvania with Mr. ROGERS.

Mr. SULLIVAN with Mr. SELLS.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado with Mr. SNYDER.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. SMITH of Idaho, is prevented from being present on account of the critical illness of his son.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with my colleague, Mr. GANDY, so I desire to withdraw my vote of "yea" and to answer "present."

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, I was called out of the Hall when the vote was being taken. I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not bring himself within the rule, which says that a Member must be in the Hall listening for the calling of his name.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. MANN. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Graham amendment was agreed to, and I move to lay that motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment as a new section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. During any national emergency resulting from a war to which the United States is a party, or from imminence of such war, the publishing willfully and without proper authority of any information relating to the national defense that is or may be useful to the enemy is hereby prohibited, and the President is hereby authorized to declare by proclamation the existence of such national emergency, and is hereby authorized from time to time by proclamation to declare the character of such information which is or may be useful to the enemy, and in any prosecution hereunder the jury trying the cause shall determine not only whether the defendant or defendants did willfully and without proper authority publish the information relating to the national defense as set out in the indictment, but also whether such information was of such character as to be useful to the enemy: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to limit or restrict any discussion, comment, or criticism upon any fact or any of the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives, or the publication of the same.

Whoever violates the foregoing provision shall upon conviction thereof be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000, or by imprisonment for not more than 10 years, or both.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, this new section as offered I think thoroughly establishes its constitutionality. It first makes a legislative enactment of that which is prohibited; in other words, it prohibits the willful and unlawful publication of any information relating to the national defense that is useful to the enemy, so that thereby it explicitly states what the crime is. Then it follows with the provision that the President is authorized to declare by proclamation the existence of the particular national emergency; also, by like proclamation, to declare the character of the information which is useful to the enemy. And, inasmuch as this is a prosecution and trial in the civil courts and could not go beyond that, the new section provides that in a trial by jury the jury is to determine not only the fact of publication but also whether the publication was information relating to the national defense and of such a character as to be useful to the enemy.

This takes away the contention of some Members that authority was given to the President of the United States to make an absolute determination of guilt. In the section proposed the President has nothing to do except to make a declaration of the character of the information which would be detrimental to the national defense and useful to the enemy, in the event of a national emergency resulting from war or its imminence.

The procedure after that would follow that the language complained of would have to be set out in the indictment, and it would be incumbent on the Government to prove by the degree of proof required in criminal cases, not alone that the publication was made, but that the publication was of information relating to the national defense which was useful to the enemy. So that the finding would be by the jury of vital facts and not a finding merely corroborative of the President's declaration.

Additional language in this amendment provides that there shall be no limit to the discussion upon any fact, and this includes also acts and policies of the National Government or its representatives. So that section 3a, as is proposed, provides for the observance of constitutional rights and yet affords that which our Commander in Chief says may be necessary for the protection of our country in time of war. At the same time it takes away from no man, from no person, the slightest atom of personal freedom guaranteed by the Constitution.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I will.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I understood the amendment to say something about a jury trial. Does it specifically guarantee a jury trial?

Mr. GARD. It does; and provides that the jury trying the case shall determine not alone whether the man did make the publication of the language set out in the indictment, but also that the language set out in the indictment is information relating to the national defense and useful to the enemy. In other words, that the man should not be convicted of a crime unless he has willfully and without authority made a publication which is intentionally useful to the enemy, and I apprehend that that is what we all want to cover.

Mr. ELSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I will.

Mr. ELSTON. The section speaks of publication without authority. That is an unusual phrase in a criminal statute, inasmuch as it implies that a precedent privilege or authority should be shown. Does not the gentleman believe that that clause could be left out because it is confusing, and I do not think it adds anything to the section. It places the burden on the party accused to show some authority.

Mr. GARD. No; on the contrary, it places the burden on the Government to show that it was done willfully and without authority.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania was recognized.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, can not we get some agreement about time?

Mr. GARD. What time would the gentleman suggest?

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman wants to spend two or three more days on this matter, I do not object.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think we can present the changes in this proposed amendment in a reasonable time. I would like five minutes. I think it is important enough for a limited debate.

Mr. GARD. I would suggest for the approval of the gentleman 20 minutes in support of the proposed section and 20 minutes against it.

Mr. MANN. I am willing to make an agreement, if it is an agreement made in good faith, and that it will be kept.

Mr. GARD. The agreement would be, of course, one in good faith if made.

Mr. MANN. I do not think that after closing debate to offer a new section and get further debate is in good faith.

Mr. GARD. That was not the purpose of offering this amendment; it was to perfect the law.

Mr. MANN. We had an agreement to close debate on section 4. Technically the gentleman gets around the agreement after a debate of two or three days by proposing a new section. You could do that 40 times if the gentleman did not carry his amendment at any time. That is a one-sided arrangement.

Mr. SHERLEY. I suggest to the gentleman——

Mr. MANN. I am not complaining; I am only seeking to know whether, if we come to an agreement, we will close debate on the subject matter.

Mr. SHERLEY. Perhaps I am somewhat responsible for the offering of this new section. But it is the crux of the whole matter and is offered to work out a solution. We do not desire any snap judgment.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Would it not be far better, if the gentleman wants to perfect this part of the bill, to prepare a separate independent bill on the subject instead of trying now to put a measure through that can not be a well-considered measure?

Mr. SHERLEY. We have had a vote for and against the gentleman's amendment and other amendments, and I shall hope that if this fails that we will have a bill dealing specially with the subject. But it did not seem to me to violate the proper procedure, now that a full attendance is here and men's minds are on this matter, to have them pass upon this question.

Mr. MANN. Unless we can have an agreement to close debate upon this subject matter there will be no more agreements made.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that debate upon this subject matter be closed in 30 minutes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, what does the gentleman mean by this subject matter?

Mr. GARD. On the matter contained in section 3a, and such like language and provisions.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman's amendment includes in it several propositions that have already been submitted to the House by separate amendment and voted down.

Mr. GARD. No; it does not. It includes some voted down and some that have not been acted upon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that debate upon the subject matter contained in section 4, which has just been stricken out of the bill, and also in section 3a, which is the same subject matter as in section 4, which is now proposed, be limited to 30 minutes. He has already consumed 5 minutes of those 30 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] for five minutes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, it certainly was my understanding when the agreement was arrived at the other day that debate on section 4 and all amendments to section 4 was to be limited and concluded within the time that was agreed to, and the presentation of this new amendment, while it may be technically in order, is not within the compass of that gentleman's agreement. As most of you did, of course, I only heard the proposed substitute read from the desk, but it seems to me that it is far worse than the original proposition as contained in the bill when reported. This measure would leave every citizen unconscious and unknowing when he was violating the law until after a jury had passed upon the question.

Yes. It says that the jury shall determine whether or not the information was calculated to give aid and comfort to the enemy, or whatever the particular language may be in the proposed substitute—"useful" is the word. There is nothing in this with regard to the intent, and the vice of all of the preceding legislation circled around that thought. Where a man does a thing with intent to hurt his country, then he ought to be punished; but when an individual or a newspaper criticizes the act of the Government with the hope of bettering conditions for his Government, although what he may say would in some aspects of it be considered by a jury as useful information to the enemy, that man, I say, in the interest of liberty and the welfare of the country ought not to be prosecuted or convicted.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky.

The SPEAKER. Nothing was said in the agreement about who should control the debate. The Speaker will therefore control it.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I would like—not in the gentleman's time—to have the amendment again reported from the desk, as many of us did not hear it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Kentucky for five minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] perhaps was led into the error of several of his statements by not having seen the exact language of the amendment. The proposal before us differs from previous proposals, first, in that it lays down the rule as to what is prohibited, making that the act of Congress, and then declares that the President shall by proclamation indicate those matters that would come within the rule of prohibition; and it is fundamentally different in this, that in order to secure conviction it requires not only that the act shall be willfully done but that the jury shall determine that the thing published was such as to be useful to the enemy. The gentleman from Pennsylvania remembers that the old historic fight that took place in connection with the libel laws of England, when the Crown was undertaking for political purposes to have men indicted for the publication of various matters, was this: The Crown contended that all the jury could determine was whether the accused had published the particular thing charged, and, if they found the accused had so published it, then the court would determine the guilt and fix the punishment. Erskine, leading the fight for the liberties of the English people, declared that the jury should also have the right to determine whether the thing published was libelous. Losing his fight in the court, he went to Parliament and there had Fox pass what is known as the Fox libel law, which was copied by us here—first in Virginia, I think, and afterwards in most of the other States—so that to-day the law of the land in nearly every State of the Union, if not in every one, is that a jury shall determine not simply whether the alleged libel has been published, but whether it is in fact a libel. By the provision offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] any man who would be indicted would have to have proved against him not only that he willfully published the thing charged but that the thing published was of such character as to be useful to the enemy.

I am not going to run over the old debate. I am one of those men who believe that there ought to be some censorship as to what is published at this time, but in my desire to provide that I was not willing to go to the extent that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] wanted us to go, and write into the law a provision that, in the first instance, I believe to be unconstitutional, because it did not lay down a rule but left it to the President to determine a crime, and also which I thought did not give to the citizen indicted under it the proper safeguards to guarantee him in his liberty and against oppression. The proposal that is now presented does permit a censorship, but it permits a censorship so guarded that no man can be under risk of punishment except in such plain cases that the judgment of everybody would be that he should be punished, and it preserves by express proviso the principle of criticism of the administration. I would be unwilling to vote for any law that undertook to shield any administration from criticism of its acts, and in time of war it is even more important than in time of peace, because in time of war the disposition of men of opposite political parties is to get together and back up the administration without regard to old party lines, so that the position that the minority party usually fills—of criticism—is very largely taken away in time of war, and for that reason there is all the more need that the press and the public at large should be in a position to criticize along legitimate lines the action of the administration. But I had called to my attention this morning the statement in a New York paper, printed unintentionally, but a statement that told the fishermen of New York how they might avoid the nets which were to protect the harbor of New York. Now, manifestly a statement of that kind ought not to be published, and manifestly there ought to be put upon the newspapers of America a realization by the passage of such a law as this that they must look and see to it that not through carelessness or design do they endanger the safety of the Republic by publishing matters that should not be published.

This whole bill will go into conference. Of necessity, there will be a full consideration of the various provisions as they may be passed, in this bill or a similar bill passed by the Senate, and any crudities of language can and will be corrected. But I believe the proposal now before the House is in line with what nearly all desire without really impairing the liberties of anyone. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, we have spent a number of days in the discussion of the validity of section 4 of this bill. There were several days of debate mainly devoted to section 4. Then there was a long discussion under the five-minute rule where anyone in the House had an opportunity to offer amendments. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] a member of the committee, could have presented his amendment under section 4. The House rejected section 4. With all of this opportunity to consider all amendments proposed to it, it rejected it after a long discussion. It is a proposition that vitally affects the liberties of the people. Gentlemen have talked as though it only affected the liberty of the press. It affects the liberties of all the people. The press, to begin with, is not published only for the information of men who publish the papers. It is published for the information of the people and the proposition which has been pending would prevent the publishing of matter between individuals as well, and now after all this discussion on the matter vitally affecting the liberties of the people, it is proposed offhand by an individual Member of the House, without committee sanction, to write what shall go into the law, and I speak with knowledge when I say there is not a man on the Republican side of the House who knows what the proposition is, and I do not believe there are five men on the Democratic side of the House who know what it is, and there is no one here with that great knowledge able to determine on a matter like this so vitally affecting the liberties of the people merely by hearing a casual reading of the amendment. I do not know whether the suggested amendment now is better or worse than those which were voted down, but it would be the height of folly for Congress in this way to attempt to perfect such a vital matter. If the gentleman from North Carolina wants to recommit this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary to prepare a proper amendment, I would say, very well, but the idea of asking the House at this time to do so shows what can be done by technical matters. The offering of an amendment, I will not say it was bad faith and yet it violates the understanding which the House had, is offered as a technical right. You propose to confer upon somebody in authority the power to do anything he pleases with the liberties of the people, hoping that he will not exercise that technical right when here we have an illustration of the exercise of a technical right to override the wishes of the House itself. [Applause.]

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to enter into the debate, but I wish to make an explanation of my position. I voted "aye" upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM]. I voted "aye" because I entertained doubts as to the constitutional validity of the bill as proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary, and I say that with deference to the committee. But in view of the changes now made by the new section under consideration, I shall vote "aye" on this new section. I appreciate that perhaps all of us do not know what is contained in this amendment, but I do not believe that we would know any better what is contained in an amendment when offered by an individual or offered by a committee. We have got to take snapshots at amendments most frequently in this House, and that has been my experience during the four years I have been here. So far as the argument is concerned, I shall not enter into it. I think that now the section is constitutional. I think, furthermore, it safeguards the rights and liberties which the former amendment did not safeguard, and for that reason I shall vote "aye" upon this new section, or substitute, offered by the gentleman from Ohio. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. There are two minutes remaining upon the side of the affirmative and eight minutes on the side of the negative. If no gentleman desires to speak——

Mr. MANN. Let us vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the proposition offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DILLON: After the word "willful" insert the following words: "and with the intent to aid the enemy."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the Dillon amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the Gard amendment, 3a.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. GARD. I ask for a division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 79, noes 91.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order, then, that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present, and evidently there is not. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 191, nays 185, answered "present" 1, not voting 54, as follows:

Mr. VENABLE with Mr. HAWLEY.

Mr. GALLIVAN with Mr. HILL.

Mr. KITCHIN with Mr. LONGWORTH.

Mr. OVERMYER with Mr. MONDELL.

Mr. POLK with Mr. SNELL.

Mr. SEARS with Mr. VOIGT.

Mr. WEAVER with Mr. HAYES.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with my colleague, the gentleman from South Dakota, Mr. GANDY, and I wish to withdraw my vote of "nay" and vote "present."

The result of the vote was announced, as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present, and the Doorkeeper will open the doors. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. Whoever in time of war willfully makes or conveys false reports or false statements with intent to interfere with the operation or success of the military or naval forces of the United States or to promote the success of the enemy or whoever in time of war willfully causes or attempts to cause insubordination, disloyalty, or refusal of duty in the military or naval forces of the United States shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000, or by imprisonment for not more than 20 years, or both.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] offered his amendment, he unnecessarily labeled it as "SEC. 3a." It would have been just as much in order, or more in order, as "SEC. 4." I ask unanimous consent that the amendment agreed to be modified and labeled as "SEC. 4." There is no use in our making ourselves look silly over in the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the amendment labeled "SEC. 3a" be labeled "SEC. 4." Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. BRITTEN. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that I may proceed for five minutes out of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes out of order. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, a matter has just come to my attention which I think the House should know, and particularly so because of the visit to the House to-morrow of the distinguished former prime minister of England, the minister of foreign affairs, at which time, I am told, he probably is going to address us.

I have just received a telegram from Chicago from a concern of shippers and manufacturers of malt. They had sold 30,000 bushels of malt to a customer in Argentina, South America. They shipped that malt to New York, naturally assuming that there would be no objection to its reshipment to Argentina, and after much parleying they are told that they can not ship. The British trade restrictions are such that an American can not even ship in an American bottom to South America without the consent of London. I wired the gentleman for further information, and he wired back and says that after much parleying and much delay he had disposed of the malt to some one else at a great financial loss to his concern, and that some one else—we will learn in a day or two—will probably sell that malt to some one in South America, who in turn will sell to the original prospective purchaser.

It occurs to me to suggest, while our distinguished visitors are here—they are our allies in war—it occurs to me that we are just as seriously interested in the defeat of Germany as they are; Germany is the common enemy—and I thought that to-day might be an opportune time to suggest that instead of dealing with generalities—and of course I realize that the British foreign minister will not deal in the same generalities that our distinguished French visitors did, because they can not refer to their Lafayette and others who came over to help our country at one time or another, so that their remarks are likely to be more specific. But I think it is time to talk about the removal of objectionable trade restrictions. How long are we expected to go under the regulations of to-day, when an American shipper, desiring to ship goods to South America or elsewhere in an American bottom under the American flag has got to wait days and weeks and months, if you please, before he can get a letter of assurance from the British foreign office in London?

That is the situation that exists to-day. They are opening our mails on the high seas, just as they were a year ago. I think that censorship on our mail and British trade restrictions should be lifted now, and that we should take care of our own trade restrictions. We are certainly capable of doing that. If not, we will make very poor allies for the British and the French.

Great Britain to-day has designated ports in Holland and in Sweden and Norway and Denmark as being under an effective blockade. We can not ship there without the consent of Great Britain. Notwithstanding that fact, however, Great Britain's exports and reexports to those same ports have increased in many instances a thousand per cent. But we can not ship there. England will not let us. Let us see what Secretary Lansing says about that particular state of affairs in his letter to Earl Grey. I read:

> It is matter of common knowledge that Great Britain exports and reexports large quantities of merchandise to Norway, Sweden, Denmark, and Holland, whose ports, so far as American commerce is concerned, she regards as blockaded.

And, further:

> The blockade upon which such methods are partly founded is ineffective, illegal, and indefensible.

Secretary Lansing goes on further to say that the American shipper, the American public, should not be subjected to that sort of treatment. He wants to know how long it is going to last.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman state what is the date of the paper he is reading from?

Mr. BRITTEN. This is a resolution I have introduced to-day.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I mean the date of the paper the gentleman is reading from.

Mr. BRITTEN. October 21, 1915. The same conditions, I am told by the State Department, exist to-day.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes.

Mr. FLOOD. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GLASS I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentlemen from Virginia object.

Mr. BRITTEN. I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. GLASS. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

> SEC. 7. Whoever harbors or conceals any person who he knows, or has reasonable grounds to believe or suspect, has committed, or is about to commit, an offense under this title shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both.

Mr. DILLON rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from South Dakota rise?

Mr. DILLON. I want to propound a question to some member of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman from North Carolina if this would prohibit the husband from harboring a wife, or a wife from harboring her husband or her sons, in the house where they live?

Mr. WEBB. I rather think so, if they are guilty.

Mr. DILLON. Does not the gentleman think that is a little too strong, and that a member of a family ought not to be required to give up another member of the family in a criminal prosecution?

Mr. WEBB. We find hardships all through the criminal law. Not even a father or mother has a right to shield a child in the commission of a crime.

Mr. DILLON. I think they ought to have a right to say nothing about it and not convey any information.

Mr. WEBB. I have no doubt the judge would take into consideration the affection of the father and mother under such circumstances, and the punishment would be very light accordingly. We have arranged the penalty so that it may be anywhere from 1 day to 10 years, or from 1 penny to $10,000.

Mr. DILLON. Would this section require a person to act affirmatively and give information?

Mr. WEBB. I do not think I understand the gentleman's question?

Mr. DILLON. Would this section require a father to give information to the prosecuting officers about matters that he knew of, connecting his son with an offense?

Mr. WEBB. I do not think he would be required to do it.

Mr. DILLON. He could remain quiet then?

Mr. WEBB. He might refuse to testify, and all the court could do would be to put him in jail for contempt.

The SPEAKER. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk completed the reading of Title I.

Mr. WEBB. I think under the order the House should now proceed to the consideration of Title XI.

The Clerk read as follows:

TITLE XI.

USE OF MAILS.

> SEC. 1100. Every letter, writing, circular, postal card, picture, print, engraving, photograph, newspaper, pamphlet, book, or other publication, matter, or thing of any kind in violation of any of the provisions of this act, or of a treasonable or anarchistic character, is hereby declared to be nonmailable matter and shall not be conveyed in the mails or delivered from any post office or by any letter carrier.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, what is the definition of "anarchistic matter" under this section?

Mr. WEBB. I will say to my friend that I described it as well as I could in my opening remarks on this bill. As I understand, an anarchist is a man who does not believe in any government.

Mr. MANN. This has nothing to do with an anarchist. This is anarchistic matter.

Mr. WEBB. Anarchistic matter is matter that advocates the abolition of the Government under which we live, or the abolition of all government.

Mr. MANN. The President of the United States has recently advocated the abolition of the existing German Government. I take it that is not anarchistic.

Mr. WEBB. I presume not. He does not advocate the abolition of all government. He advocates the abolition of one form and the substitution of another and better.

Mr. MANN. What is the occasion for putting this in here, then? There is at present a criminal law that covers this subject very fully. Nobody is now advocating the abolition of all government. What is the object of letting the Postmaster General determine what anarchistic matter is?

Mr. WEBB. The Postmaster General has nothing to do with this.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the Postmaster General, or a hireling of the Postmaster General, or, more properly speaking, an employee of the Post Office Department, is the man who will determine this.

Mr. WEBB. The Postmaster General is given no authority in this section.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman thinks the Postmaster General has no jurisdiction, who will enforce this?

Mr. WEBB. The postmaster.

Mr. MANN. All postmasters act under the direction of the Postmaster General.

Mr. WEBB. The postmasters exclude matter from the mails.

Mr. MANN. Under the direction of the Postmaster General.

Mr. WEBB. The local postmaster would have to do the physical excluding from the mails of the matter covered in this section. Then if a man mailed it in violation of the law, the courts of the United States would try him for a violation of the law.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, that is another thing. The Postmaster General stops the transmission in the mail. There is a newspaper published out West that I do not sympathize with, which I have heard described here as anarchistic. A number of attempts have been made to have a provision put in the law which would exclude that paper from the mails. This provision would do it. Maybe that is all right; I am not undertaking to say as to that. But the Postmaster General under this provision can exclude from the mails anything he pleases, on the ground that it is anarchistic.

Mr. WEBB. I think the courts would have a right to issue an injunction to prohibit the postmaster from doing that if his act was wrong. Undoubtedly, any aggrieved party would have the right of appeal to the courts. I do not know whether my friend heard my statement on this question or not.

Mr. MANN. I heard about a dozen of them, but I do not know whether I heard this one or not. I was entertained and instructed every time.

Mr. WEBB. The point I referred to is the very point he is discussing now. The reason that actuated the committee in inserting the word "anarchistic" was this: The committee, when it first drafted this bill, included only the word "treasonable" and eliminated the word "anarchistic"; but the Post Office Department sent down to us some pamphlets that had been going through the mail that were so horrible that neither I nor any other Member of the House was willing to have them go into the RECORD, although read from the Clerk's desk here, and that was what impelled us to put in the word "anarchistic." I am sure if the gentleman heard that matter read from the desk, he will agree that nobody should print such articles as that in a newspaper and send it through the mails of the United States.

Mr. MANN. There are a great many newspaper articles that I do not like to read. In fact, I think most of the articles in the newspapers are not worth the time to read them, and I do not read them. But that is not the question. The question is whether the Postmaster General, who now has almost autocratic power—greater power over mail matter than the Czar of Russia had—shall determine what is anarchistic matter.

Mr. WEBB. No; he can not determine finally.

Mr. MANN. But he does under this bill.

Mr. WEBB. The final determination is in the courts of the United States.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do I understand the gentleman to contend that if the Congress forbids matter of a certain character being put in the mails, and leaves it to the Postmaster General to determine the character of that matter, the courts have any authority whatsoever in determining whether the Postmaster General has a right to carry out the direction of Congress?

Mr. WEBB. I say the matter is not acted upon by the Postmaster General under this section, but by the postmasters.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to say that the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States are uniformly in the opposite direction, holding invariably that under the post-office clause of the Constitution Congress has the right, if it sees fit, to exclude from the mails whatever it determines to exclude. These decisions point out that it can not perhaps exclude from interstate commerce, but it has plenary power to regulate the Postal Service as it sees fit, and if this amendment is adopted we vest full authority in the Postmaster General to pass upon the character of a publication without the right of resort to the courts to review his decision.

Mr. WEBB. As to that I will say that Mr. Lamar, Solicitor of the Post Office Department, was asked the question if a postmaster should exclude any matter which under the decision of the Postmaster General was regarded as anarchistic, what would be the remedy of the person who sent it through the mail, and he said, "Take it into court and get an injunction or mandamus."

Mr. STAFFORD. That is not the law of the United States.

Mr. MANN. It is not the law that is being enforced every day in the Post Office Department.

Mr. CURRY of California. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last two words. I want to ask the chairman of the committee if under this title the Government, or a bureau of the Government, would have the right to censor the mail of Members of Congress or the governors of the States, and if under the provisions of this title the Government, or a bureau of the Government, would not have the authority and right to censor the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD?

Mr. WEBB. I do not think so.

Mr. CURRY of California. The language is very broad.

Mr. WEBB. I assume that no Member of Congress is going to make an anarchistic speech advocating the destruction of the Government, or advocating no Government, while he is an officer of the existing Government.

Mr. CURRY of California. The question I asked was if an inspector was permited to open and censor the mail.

Mr. WEBB. Suppose a treasonable speech was made on the floor. Ought it not to be censored?

Mr. CURRY of California. We would censor that ourselves.

Mr. WEBB. Then, you might censor anarchistic matter.

Mr. CURRY of California. We would, and it would be a lot better than to have a $1,200 clerk do it.

Mr. WEBB. The only way that a sealed package can be opened which is going through the mail is by issuing a search warrant and taking the package into court and opening it. No postmaster or any branch of the Post Office Department has the right or power in that connection to open a sealed package.

Mr. MANN. You could get the English Government to do it without any trouble. They open all of our mail.

Mr. WEBB. I know that has been done, but it has been done by force and not by law.

Mr. MANN. It has been done by the law of England.

Mr. WEBB. Yes; orders in council, against which we have protested.

Mr. TEMPLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. TEMPLE. The paragraph provides that every letter in violation of the provisions of the act shall be nonmailable and shall not be conveyed in the mails or delivered from any post office or by any letter carrier. How is the letter carrier to know whether a sealed letter comes under that description or not?

Mr. WEBB. He would not know it, but that is the law to-day.

Mr. TEMPLE. Then what is the necessity of putting it in here?

Mr. WEBB. This is practically a reenactment of the present statute, with the addition of the words "treasonable or anarchistic."

Mr. TEMPLE. Why is it necessary to reenact it?

Mr. WEBB. Because it does not apply to the things in this statute. The only way would be——

Mr. TEMPLE. I should like to know whether they are going to open my letters to find out whether they are mailable or whether the letter carrier is authorized to deliver them?

Mr. WEBB. The only way would be that if you suspected a man of transmitting through the mails prohibited matter you get a search warrant and discover the letter, and if you find the letter and that it has been mailed you can convict him.

Mr. GOOD. Can you convict the letter carrier?

Mr. WEBB. Not without he had some knowledge of it.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, I desire to improve this time by calling the attention of the House to the character of some publications and other matter probably intended to be sent through the mails that are prohibited and penalized under this section. I have received from a confidential source a copy of what is called The Internationalist, published by the Socialist Propaganda League of America. Without going into the full text of it, which obviously should not be printed, I will read a few extracts:

> In conformity with and applying these general principles the Socialist Party of America lays down the following program of action during the war:
> (1) Representatives of the Socialist Party in the various governing bodies shall refuse to vote for war credits or any other measures of war. Action shall immediately be taken to expel party members violating this decision.
> (2) We pledge ourselves and our organization to resist all efforts at recruiting by means of meetings, an aggressive educational propaganda, mass demonstrations, and by any other means in accord with revolutionary socialist principles and tactics.

And so on in the same line and with the same general purport in purpose and effect. It winds up by saying that they will pursue this policy whether it be declared legal or illegal. This circular came from a confidential source as being pertinent to the discussion of the espionage bill.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Is it the judgment of the gentleman that if the law is passed this matter could not legally go through the mails?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That is the intention.

Mr. FESS. In other words, that would fall within the terminology of anarchistic.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes; defiance of law, order, and government, and these enemies are employing our own mails to facilitate the dissemination of their propaganda.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman is a military expert.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I am not.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman is so considered by the House. I noticed this morning in a rather prominent place information that evidently comes from the military arm of the Government, giving away the plan that is proposed to destroy the submarines by discovering their base and surrounding them with nets.

Does not the gentleman think there ought to be some law to curb these inefficient Government officials who are giving out, apparently, this kind of information that ought not to be given out under any circumstances?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, I think it may be stated as a general proposition, not only with regard to this but to many other occasions, that if some law could be made to work that would stop people talking and writing too much we would all vote for it.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; we would all be convicted under it.

Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I do not know whether the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE] who read that circular or letter believes that such matters ought not to be published. Somebody may want to advocate that this Government make peace with Germany. Do I understand that the gentleman thinks that such a man has no rights under the Government?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Is the gentleman addressing his remarks to me?

Mr. MANN. I was only commenting upon the gentleman's remarks. I have heard very strong language uttered by Members of this House since the conscript amendment was passed by the House denouncing what had already been done. Do I understand that gentlemen think that those men are traitors? There seems to be a great idea just now abroad in the land that nobody shall be permitted to express an opinion unless it agrees with your own. A whole lot of people here and elsewhere seem to think that if a man does not agree with you he is a traitor and is guilty of treasonable utterances. Some people seem to imagine that no one is right except themselves. The very principles of our Government, the basis upon which we founded our liberty, is the right of people to differ and express their opinions. Then the majority is supposed to have control of Government, but not to oppress those who differ with them in opinion. I am not in favor yet of giving the administration such power as has just been granted it by the House. Perhaps I may be a traitor because I do not agree with the foolishness that the House adopted this afternoon. I am not prepared to let some men in this Government tell me how I shall think or what I shall say, and thinking so myself I have no desire to tell other people how they shall think or what they shall say. Freedom is to be attained by having liberty, not by curtailing it. [Applause.]

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania moves to insert, after the word "carrier," in the eleventh line, page 60, the following:

"Provided, That nothing in this section shall be taken or construed to clothe the Government of the United States or any department thereof with power to open any letter intrusted to the mail by any citizen, except on cause shown under oath in accordance with section 10 hereof."

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I do not see any use in writing into the law what the Supreme Court has decided. They have decided that the only way you can get into a sealed package of mail is by having a search warrant issued. There is no use in writing that into the law. To attempt to open a sealed package is contrary to the criminal law. I have known of postmasters who have been thrown into jail for doing that.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman ought to realize that the Supreme Court has not passed upon this bill, because it has not yet become a law, and this provision is simply to make clear that it is not the purpose of this law to clothe any Postmaster General or any subordinate in the department with the power to open my letter or your letter when in transit through the mail.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, the Supreme Court did construe this paragraph line by line and word for word, except that the words "treasonable" and "anarchistic" were not in it. A case arose in New York, and in an exhaustive opinion the court declared that no Government authority had the power to open any sealed package of mail except by first swearing out a search warrant and taking charge of it in a regular way. I do not see any need for incorporating what is the law now.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state in what case the Supreme Court construed the language of this section as it is written in this bill? The expression was on a different statute.

Mr. WEBB. I do not recall the title of the case, but I think it is in the ninety-sixth United States. I read it last evening. I believe the title is "In re Jackson," in the ninety-sixth United States.

Mr. WALSH. But it is different language.

Mr. WEBB. Oh, no.

Mr. STEENERSON rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. STEENERSON. To discuss the amendment.

The SPEAKER. Debate upon the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. STEENERSON. Then I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Speaker, this applies not only to ordinary mail, unsealed, but it applies to sealed letters, and adds to the kind of sealed letters that are made unmailable; sealed letters that contain anything in violation of the provisions of this act. That seems to me to be sufficient. I doubt the wisdom of including the word "anarchistic," because there is a great deal of difference of opinion about what that word means. Some very good people advocate, simply as a social and political ideal, the absence of force and government, and they have no intention of interfering with the Government or doing anything that is treasonable, and, therefore, by adding the word "anarchistic" we might punish people who are not intending to do anything that is treasonable.

With regard to the precise question involved in this amendment, I agree with the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

In the case In re Jackson, Ninety-sixth Supreme Court Reports, where the lottery law was involved, they held that the constitutional provision against unreasonable search would apply to letters; that sealed letters or packages in the mail were, in the theory of the law, in the possession of the sender, and that to open them would require proceedings under affidavit sufficient to authorize the search of a man's private residence, the very thing that is contemplated by the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

In that case the court said:

Letters and sealed packages of this kind in the mail are as fully guarded from examination and inspection, except as to their outward form and weight, as if they were retained by the parties forwarding them in their own domiciles. The constitutional guaranty of the right of the people to be secure in their papers against unreasonable searches and seizures extends to their papers, thus closed against inspection, wherever they may be. Whilst in the mail, they can only be opened and examined under like warrant, issued upon similar oath or affirmation, particularly describing the thing to be seized, as is required when papers are subjected to search in one's own household. No law of Congress can place in the hands of officials connected with the Postal Service any authority to invade the secrecy of letters and such sealed packages in the mail; and all regulations adopted as to mail matter of this kind must be in subordination to the great principle embodied in the fourth amendment to the Constitution. * * * Whilst regulations excluding matter from the mail can not be enforced in a way which would require or permit an examination into letters, or sealed packages subject to letter postage, without warrant, issued upon oath or affirmation, in the search for prohibited matter, they may be enforced upon competent evidence of their violation obtained in other ways, as from the parties receiving the letters or packages, or from agents depositing them in the post offices, or others cognizant of the facts.

So I agree with the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] that it is not necessary to adopt this amendment, because sealed letters are protected by the Constitution of the United States against unreasonable search and the practice of the department in regard to sealed letters is, and has been for many years, not to open them; clerks or postmasters are not entitled to open them; and the only way prosecution can be successful for mailing an obscene letter that is sealed, with nothing on the outside to indicate its contents, or one in violation of the lottery law, is for the Government to get proof as to the contents of a letter from the outside, or from some clerk or employee, of the sender, or by the man who receives it, the addressee, or some one who has seen the letter to prove its contents. The Post Office Department does not now attempt to censor the mails, so far as sealed letters are concerned, even if they are in violation of the law against lotteries and the sending of obscene matter, and for this reason I do not believe it is necessary to adopt the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but I do not think that the word "anarchistic" here is unnecessary. If you simply make this prohibition against mailable matter which is in violation of this act, you go as far as this act was intended to go. You are simply running into a field that is very dangerous if you include this word "anarchistic," which may be construed in many different ways. In the Standard Dictionary one of the definitions given is, "An anarchist is one who advocates the absence of formal government as a social and political ideal." Now, if a person advocates that as an ideal, that does not mean that that is treasonable.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired and the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn. There is an amendment pending offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to offer that as an amendment to the amendment? The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CROSSER: Page 60, line 9, after the word "treasonable," strike out "or anarchistic," and insert, after the word "character," "or of a character advocating the destruction of or injury to the Government by violence."

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last three words for the purpose of——

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to ask the gentleman from Ohio if his amendment is intended to be an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. CROSSER. It is offered as a substitute really.

Mr. MANN. It is not a substitute; it has nothing to do with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. It is an amendment to the section.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw the amendment I have offered as a proviso to this section with the consent of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania desires to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Does the gentleman from Ohio want to offer his amendment as a separate proposition?

Mr. CROSSER. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again report the amendment so that everybody will understand it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CROSSER: Page 60, line 9, after the word "treasonable," strike out "or anarchistic," and insert, after the word "character," "or of a character advocating the destruction of or injury to the Government by violence."

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, I offer this amendment for the reason that there are a great many very estimable men of high character, intellect, and education who advocate what they call philosophic anarchy. Their philosophy is of a very idealistic nature, and yet if this bill passes with the language in the section as it now stands, the writings of these men would be barred from the mails entirely, so that they could not send their addresses or writings from one part of the country to another.

Mr. KINKAID. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROSSER. Yes.

Mr. KINKAID. Does the gentleman mean to say advocating anarchy or socialism? The gentleman said "anarchy."

Mr. CROSSER. I said that there are a great many very estimable gentlemen of education and ability who advocate what they call philosophic anarchy. Their idea is that ultimately there ought not to be any government at all. I am told that Emerson's ideas tended in that direction. I know a man, one of the brainiest, finest men I know, who holds such views as that. He would not do harm to any person or to the Government, but he derives a great deal of satisfaction from his theories. He is a very close thinker and a close reasoner. Now, it seems to me that men of that particular type, who possibly may be considered what the chairman of the committee has called an anarchist, will be done a great injustice by having their writings and philosophy barred from the mails. What the gentleman from North Carolina had in mind I am quite certain is literature which advocates violence, which advocates the violent destruction or overturning of the Government or injury to the Government.

Mr. FARR. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. CROSSER. I do.

Mr. FARR. Might not that type of philosophy incite somebody else?

Mr. CROSSER. Not the kind to which I refer. Emerson, I am told, advocated a kind of anarchy and everybody knows that he was a very fine writer.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROSSER. Yes.

Mr. FESS. The philosophic anarchy that was indorsed by Emerson, Tolstoy, and many others was a state of society under whose ideal operation there was no need of government in restraint.

Mr. CROSSER. That is exactly it.

Mr. FESS. There is not any doubt but that there is that sort of anarchy, and yet we apply the term to "forcible anarchy."

Mr. CROSSER. The gentleman will admit that if this bill in its present form is enacted into law we would prevent the passage of such literature as that through the mails.

Mr. FESS. As one of these authors said, "The ideal conception of heaven is that of anarchy."

Mr. CROSSER. Yes. I do not remember the names of other writers at the present time, but Emerson, Thoreau, Tolstoy, are men often so referred to. It seems to me it would be a great misfortune if their writings could be barred from the mails at the whim of some executive officer by putting his own construction upon it.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROSSER. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. I thought perhaps it should be understood that Mr. Emerson never claimed to be an anarchist. The anarchists, however, have claimed that Emerson's philosophy was in reality within the anarchistic definition.

Mr. CROSSER. Some men take a pride in giving their writings a label and others do not. Some like to give them the name "philosophic anarchy." Personally I am not subscribing to any of these doctrines, but I think, Mr. Speaker, that it is a dangerous thing to say, "You shall not write or say things except those with which I agree." I think we are doing a great deal toward preventing the freedom of thought and restricting the liberty of expressing thought that is so necessary in a free Government.

Mr. TOWNER. I agree with what the gentleman says, of course, but I think Mr. Emerson would be very much surprised if he had known that after his death he would be claimed as an anarchist.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER] has expired.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. TALBOTT, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence, until Monday, on account of important business.

ESPIONAGE.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to find here a Democrat with enough love of democracy to make that motion. The ignorance displayed by the membership of this House on the subjects of socialism and anarchism is a sufficient reason for eliminating the words "or anarchistic" from this section.

The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE] culled from the text of a long article from some publication, the character of which I do not know, the phrase "international revolutionary socialism," and he thought that expression was so horrid, was so suggestive of revolution, of an immediate change by violence that he welcomed the adoption of this section with the phrase "anarchistic" in it, because it promised to exclude from the mails anything dealing with "international revolutionary socialism." His intention is good, but he is ignorant on the subject. I am a believer in international revolutionary socialism. I believe that we are in the midst of a revolution, and that revolution began long ago with the organization of the first fighting unit on the economic and the political fields with the spread of intelligence among the working people. That is when it began. The word "revolution" does not mean violence.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The gentleman was addressing his remarks to me?

Mr. LONDON. I was referring to the phrase "revolutionary international socialism," and it seems to me the gentleman was trying to convey the impression that the use of that expression in itself constituted a violation of the law.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The gentleman quite misunderstood my expression. I was merely quoting the language that the socialists had employed in the circular as being objectionable.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I want to ask the gentleman if he believes in direct action?

Mr. LONDON. I will take care of the lumber interests of the State of Washington in a minute. I will come to that. Now, unless I entirely misunderstood the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE] the things that he quoted were not in violation of any existing law.

Gentlemen, let me call your attention to the fundamental fact. I tried to make it clear yesterday. There is a world of distinction between the philosophy of a thing and the method. The Ku-Klux were terrorists. They used violence, but they were not socialists; they were not anarchists. They had no distinct philosophy about the reorganization of the world. They were just Ku-Klux, using terrorism to promote the things they believed in. The Night Rider, fighting the Tobacco Trust, was a terrorist. He was not an anarchist. He was a violator of the law. He resorted to violence. The industrial corporations, whether in the State of Washington or in Colorado, who hired gunmen against strikers were terrorists. Please draw the distinction between method and philosophy. So far as the socialists are concerned, they have always and everywhere sought to promote their cause by peaceful methods. Even Social Democrats of Russia, having to deal with the most autocratic Government in the world, pinned their faith upon education and the growth of a greater knowledge among the people.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. LONDON. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to proceed for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONDON. Now, I ask you gentlemen to eliminate that phrase. It will give an opportunity to every ignorant person and to every little postmaster and to every man who is under the pressure, it may be, of the lumber interests or of some other interest to remove from the mail everything that will advise the people to fight for their rights under the guise that they advocate anarchy. Make it clear that you are opposed to the use of the mail for the purpose of advocating the overthrow of government by violence. Make it clear so that there will be no mistake about it.

I call your serious attention to it, and I speak in all earnestness, hoping that there is enough democracy and enough love of liberty left here to prevent any possible abuse by a petty official, by an ignorant official, although he may be a well-meaning man, but ignorant of the rights of the common man, of the plain man. Do not try to suppress ideas by law. You can not do it. You can not accomplish it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman was in the Hall the other afternoon when the gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE] read from a circular. Does the gentleman believe that the Government should permit that kind of a publication to be sent through the mails?

Mr. LONDON. Representative EAGLE read only a part of the circular. If he wanted to challenge me to reply to him, he should have read the entire circular, because I do not know to what extent the part he did not read modified the meaning of the part that he did read. Anyone can understand that.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. What does the gentleman say about this? I read from that circular again:

> In the event of conscription being forced upon the people of this country by the ruling class, we shall initiate a movement for the refusal of military service; moreover, we shall support by all means massed movements of the people organized to resist and refuse compulsory military service.

Mr. LONDON. I understand it to be the opinion of the socialists that in the event of conscription being adopted they would immediately begin a movement for the repeal of that law, placing themselves clearly on a legal foundation; and they certainly have the right to immediately begin a movement to repeal an obnoxious law.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield again?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Vermont?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I will say to the gentleman that I do not want to take out a single phrase from a document and base questions upon it. That would be an unfair way to do.

Mr. LONDON. Read the entire document.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I would be willing to do it, but the character of the document is such that it should not be printed and circulated.

Mr. LONDON. I am willing to trust to the judgment of the gentleman from Vermont. I do not want him to be frightened by the word "internationalism." Our President has proclaimed the doctrines of internationalism. We are supposed to help bring about internationalism in the world and international peace. [Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Let me read this:

> We call upon the working class, organized and unorganized, to institute strikes against the mobilization of industry and military forces under the guise of which the ruling class deprives the people of its civil and industrial rights; and we pledge ourselves to encourage and support these strikes and develop them into a general revolutionary movement against war and capitalism.

Mr. LONDON. Well, people have the right to oppose capitalism, and they have the right to oppose war. Had I agreed with the policy of using revolutionary methods to oppose the war, had I agreed with that policy, I would not have continued my attendance on the floor of Congress. I believe that by educating the people and by reaching the masses we would make war impossible.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. There is one thing more that I wish to refer to, if the gentleman will permit me to intrude on his time.

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Here is a pledge which men are asked to sign and send to headquarters:

> I, the undersigned, solemnly protesting against the working class and the country of my birth (or adoption) being caught in the steel trap of militarism, will refuse to render any kind of military service when informed that 10,000 male citizens of the United States (or those who have declared their intention to become citizens), of an age between 18 and 45, have signed this pledge.

Mr. LONDON. I do not hesitate to say that I do not indorse this program, because I can not advise another man to do that which I would not do. That is why even against unjust wars and even against capitalism I believe that there is only one remedy, and that is more knowledge on the part of the people. If there had been a majority of socialists in this Congress there would have been no declaration of war. With a majority of Democrats and Republicans, the people got what they voted for.

Mr. CROSSER. Would not what has been read by the gentleman from Vermont be prohibited by the language of the amendment, anyhow?

Mr. LONDON. It would, undoubtedly.

The SPEAKER. Debate on this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER] should be adopted. I do not believe you will suppress either socialism or anarchy by endeavoring by law to stop people from talking about them. The English Government permits people always to talk about what they please, and when you permit men to say what they please frequently you disgust people with what they have said, and frequently by the very absence of law you get the thing you would not accomplish by the enactment of law. I have no patience with the idea that because some of us voted against conscription we ought not to give our whole soul, heart, mind, and body to enabling the President of the United States to get the soldiers necessary to fight this war. I do not suppose any man in this House was more opposed to conscription than I was. I voted against the whole bill, because it had conscription in it, but the majority of the Members of the House disagreed with me, and whatever may be the final outcome, I trust that Congress will have the courage, when the war is over, to break up the standing army and go back to peace strength. I have been afraid of a large standing army, but notwithstanding that fact I now stand absolutely where every man ought to stand—squarely behind the Army and Navy—in order that we may get the very best Army possible and in the very quickest method under the law which you gentlemen will vote for when the amendment is adopted.

But, Mr. Speaker, I rose for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing one of the most marvelous documents ever written by the pen of man upon free speech and free press. That is the marvelous document of John Milton, called the Areopagitica, said to be the most magnificent document ever written upon this subject in the entire annals of English literature.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The document is as follows:

AREOPAGITICA.

[By John Milton.]

They who to states and governors of the commonwealth direct their speech, high court of parliament, or wanting such access in a private condition, write that which they foresee may advance the public good; I suppose them, as at the beginning of no mean endeavour, not a little altered and moved inwardly in their minds; some with doubt of what will be the success, others with fear of what will be the censure; some with hope, others with confidence of what they have to speak. And me perhaps each of these dispositions, as the subject was whereon I entered, may have at other times variously affected; and likely might in these foremost expressions now also disclose which of them swayed most, but that the very attempt of this address thus made, and the thought of whom it hath recourse to, hath got the power within me to a passion, far more welcome than incidental to a preface.

Which though I stay not to confess ere any ask, I shall be blameless, if it be no other than the joy and gratulation which it brings to all who wish to promote their country's liberty; whereof this whole discourse proposed will be a certain testimony, if not a trophy. For this is not the liberty which we can hope, that no grievance ever should arise in the commonwealth; that let no man in this world expect; but when complaints are freely heard, deeply considered, and speedily reformed, then is the utmost bound of civil liberty obtained that wise men look for. To which if I now manifest, by the very sound of this which I shall utter, that we are already in good part arrived, and yet from such a steep disadvantage of tyranny and superstition grounded into our principles as was beyond the manhood of a Roman recovery, it will be attributed first, as is most due, to the strong assistance of God, our deliverer; next, to your faithful guidance and undaunted wisdom, lords and commons of England. Neither is it in God's esteem the diminution of his glory when honourable things are spoken of good men and worthy magistrates; which if I now first should begin to do, after so fair a progress of your laudable deeds, and such a long obligement upon the whole realm to your indefatigable virtues, I might be justly reckoned among the tardiest and the unwillingest of them that praise ye.

Nevertheless there being three principal things without which all praising is but courtship and flattery: First, when that only is praised which is solidly worth praise; next, when greatest likelihoods are brought that such things are truly and really in those persons to whom they are ascribed; the other, when he who praises, by shewing that such his actual persuasion is of whom he writes, can demonstrate that he flatters not; the former two of these I have heretofore endeavoured, rescuing the employment from him who went about to impair your merits with a trivial and malignant encomium; the latter as belonging chiefly to mine own acquittal, that whom I so extolled I did not flatter, hath been reserved opportunely to this occasion. For he who freely magnifies what hath been nobly done, and fears not to declare as freely what might be done better, gives ye the best covenant of his fidelity; and that his loyalest affection and his hope waits on your proceedings. His highest praising is not flattery, and his plainest advice is a kind of praising; for though I should affirm and hold by argument that it would fare better with truth, with learning, and the commonwealth, if one of your published orders, which I should name, were called in; yet at the same time it could not but much redound to the lustre of your mild and equal government, whenas private persons are hereby animated to think ye better pleased with public advice than other statists have been delighted heretofore with public flattery. And men will then see what difference there is between the magnanimity of a triennial parliament and that jealous haughtiness of prelates and cabin counsellors that usurped of late, whenas they shall observe ye in the midst of your victories and successes more gently brooking written exceptions against a voted order than other courts, which had produced nothing worth memory but the weak ostentation of wealth, would have endured the least signified dislike at any sudden proclamation.

If I should thus far presume upon the meek demeanour of your civil and gentle greatness, lords and commons, as what your published order hath directly said, that to gainsay, I might defend myself with ease, if any should accuse me of being new or insolent, did they but know how much better I find ye esteem it to imitate the old and elegant humanity of Greece than the barbaric pride of a Hunnish and Norwegian stateliness. And out of those ages to whose polite wisdom and letters we owe that we are not yet Goths and Jutlanders, I could name him who from his private house wrote that discourse to the parliament of Athens that persuades them to change the form of democracy which was then established. Such honour was done in those days to men who professed the study of wisdom and eloquence, not only in their own country but in other lands, that cities and signiories heard them gladly, and with great respect, if they had aught in public to admonish the state. Thus did Dion Prusæus, a stranger and a private orator, counsel the Rhodians against a former edict; and I abound with other like examples, which to set here would be superfluous. But if from the industry of a life wholly dedicated to studious labours, and those natural endowments haply not the worst for two and fifty degrees of northern latitude, so much must be derogated as to count me not equal to any of those who had this privilege, I would obtain to be thought not so inferior as yourselves are superior to the most of them who received their counsel; and how far you excel them, be assured, lords and commons, there can no greater testimony appear than when your prudent spirit acknowledges and obeys the voice of reason, from what quarter soever it be heard speaking; and renders ye as willing to repeat any act of your own setting forth as any set forth by your predecessors.

If ye be thus resolved, as it were injury to think ye were not, I know not what should withhold me from presenting ye with a fit instance wherein to shew both that love of truth which ye eminently profess, and that uprightness of your judgment which is not wont to be partial to yourselves; by judging over again that order which ye have ordained "to regulate printing: that no book, pamphlet, or paper shall be henceforth printed, unless the same be first approved and licensed by such, or at least one of such, as shall be thereto appointed." For that part which preserves justly every man's copy to himself, or provides for the poor, I touch not; only wish they be not made pretences to abuse and persecute honest and painful men who offend not in either of these particulars. But that other clause of licensing books, which we thought had died with his brother quadrangesimal and matrimonial when the prelates expired, I shall now attend with such a homily as shall lay before ye, first, the inventors of it to be those whom ye will be loath to own; next, what is to be thought in general of reading, whatever sort the books be; and that this order avails nothing to the suppressing of scandalous, seditious, and libellous books, which were mainly intended to be suppressed. Last, that it will be primely to the discouragement of all learning, and the stop of truth, not only by disexercising and blunting our abilities in what we know already, but by hindering and cropping the discovery that might be yet further made, both in religious and civil wisdom.

I deny not but that it is of greatest concernment in the church and commonwealth to have a vigilant eye how books demean themselves, as well as men; and thereafter to confine, imprison, and do sharpest justice on them as malefactors; for books are not absolutely dead things, but do contain a progeny of life in them to be as active as that soul was whose progeny they are; nay, they do preserve as in a vial the purest efficacy and extraction of that living intellect that bred them. I know they are as lively, and as vigorously productive, as those fabulous dragon's teeth; and being sown up and down, may chance to spring up armed men. And yet, on the other hand, unless wariness be used, as good almost kill a man as kill a good book: who kills a man kills a reasonable creature, God's image; but he who destroys a good book, kills reason itself, kills the image of God, as it were, in the eye. Many a man lives a burden to the earth; but a good book is the precious life blood of a master-spirit, embalmed and treasured up on purpose to a life beyond life. It is true, no age can restore a life, whereof, perhaps, there is no great loss; and revolutions of ages do not oft recover the loss of a rejected truth, for the want of which whole nations fare the worse. We should be wary, therefore, what persecution we raise against the living labours of public men, how we spill that seasoned life of man, preserved and stored up in books; since we see a kind of homicide may be thus committed, sometimes a martyrdom; and if it extend to the whole impression, a kind of massacre, whereof the execution ends not in the slaying of an elemental life, but strikes at the ethereal and fifth essence, the breath of reason itself; slays an immortality rather than a life. But lest I should be condemned of introducing licence while I oppose licensing, I refuse not the pains to be so much historical as will serve to shew what hath been done by ancient and famous commonwealths against this disorder, till the very time that this project of licensing crept out of the inquisition, was catched up by our prelates, and hath caught some of our presbyters.

In Athens, where books and wits were ever busier than in any other part of Greece, I find but only two sorts of writings which the magistrate cared to take notice of; those either blasphemous and atheistical, or libellous. Thus the books of Protagoras were by the judges of Areopagus commanded to be burnt, and himself banished the territory for a discourse begun with his confessing not to know "whether there were gods, or whether not." And against defaming, it was agreed that none should be traduced by name, as was the manner of Vetus Comœdia, whereby we may guess how they censured libelling; and this course was quick enough, as Cicero writes, to quell both the desperate wits of other atheists, and the open way of defaming, as the event showed. Of other sects and opinions, though tending to voluptuousness, and the denying of divine Providence, they took no heed. Therefore we do not read that either Epicurus, or that libertine school of Cyrene, or what the Cynic impudence uttered, was ever questioned by the laws. Neither is it recorded that the writings of those old comedians were suppressed, though the acting of them were forbid; and that Plato commended the reading of Aristophanes, the loosest of them all, to his royal scholar Dionysius, is commonly known, and may be excused, if holy Chrysostom, as is reported, nightly studied so much the same author, and had the art to cleanse a scurrilous vehemence into the style of a rousing sermon.

That other leading city of Greece, Lacedæmon, considering that Lycurgus their lawgiver was so addicted to elegant learning as to have been the first that brought out of Ionia the scattered works of Homer, and sent the poet Thales from Crete, to prepare and mollify the Spartan surliness with his smooth songs and odes, the better to plant among them law and civility; it is to be wondered how museless and unbookish they were, minding nought but the feats of war. There needed no licensing of books among them, for they disliked all but their own laconic apophthegms, and took a slight occasion to chase Archilochus out of their city, perhaps for composing in a higher strain than their own soldiery ballads and roundels could reach to; or if it were for his broad verses, they were not therein so cautious but they were as dissolute in their promiscuous conversing; whence Euripides affirms, in Andromache, that their women were all unchaste.

This much may give us light after what sort of books were prohibited among the Greeks. The Romans also for many ages trained up only to a military roughness, resembling most the Lacedæmonian guise, knew of learning little but what their twelve tables and the pontific college with their augurs and flamens taught them in religion and law; so unacquainted with other learning that when Carneades and Critolaus, with the stoic Diogenes, coming ambassadors to Rome, took thereby occasion to give the city a taste of their philosophy, they were suspected for seducers by no less a man than Cato the Censor, who moved it in the senate to dismiss them speedily, and to banish all such Attic babblers out of Italy. But Scipio and others of the noblest senators withstood him and his old Sabine austerity; honoured and admired the men; and the censor himself at last, in his old age, fell to the study of that whereof before he was so scrupulous. And yet, at the same time, Nævius and Plautus, the first Latin comedians, had filled the city with all the borrowed scenes of Menander and Philemon. Then began to be considered there also what was to be done to libellous books and authors; for Nævius was quickly cast into prison for his unbridled pen, and released by the tribunes upon his recantation: we read also that libels were burnt, and the makers punished, by Augustus.

The like severity, no doubt, was used, if aught were impiously written against their esteemed gods. Except in these two points, how the world went in books the magistrate kept no reckoning. And therefore Lucretius, without impeachment, versifies his Epicurism to Memmius, and had the honour to be set forth the second time by Cicero, so great a father of the commonwealth; although himself disputes against that opinion in his own writings. Nor was the satirical sharpness or naked plainness of Lucilius, or Catullus, or Flaccus, by any order prohibited. And for matters of state, the story of Titus Livius, though it extolled that part which Pompey held, was not therefore suppressed by Octavius Cæsar, of the other faction. But that Naso was by him banished in his old age for the wanton poems of his youth, was but a mere covert of state over some secret cause; and besides, the books were neither banished nor called in. From hence we shall meet with little else but tyranny in the Roman empire, that we may not marvel if not so often bad as good books were silenced. I shall therefore deem to have been large enough, in producing what among the ancients was punishable to write, save only which, all other arguments were free to treat on.

By this time the emperors were become Christians, whose discipline in this point I do not find to have been more severe than was formerly in practice. The books of those whom they took to be grand heretics were examined, refuted, and condemned in the general councils; and not till then were prohibited, or burnt, by authority of the emperor. As for the writings of heathen authors, unless they were plain invectives against Christianity, as those of Porphyrius and Proclus, they met with no interdict that can be cited, till about the year 400, in a Carthaginian council, wherein bishops themselves were forbid to read the books of Gentiles, but heresies they might read; while others long before them, on the contrary, scrupled more the books of heretics than of Gentiles. And that the primitive councils and bishops were wont only to declare what books were not commendable, passing no further, but leaving it to each one's conscience to read or to lay by, till after the year 800, is observed already by Padre Paolo, the great unmasker of the Trentine council. After which time the popes of Rome, engrossing what they pleased of political rule into their own hands, extended their dominion over men's eyes, as they had before over their judgments, burning and prohibiting to be read what they fancied not; yet sparing in their censures, and the books not many which they so dealt with; till Martin the Fifth, by his bull, not only prohibited, but was the first that excommunicated the reading of heretical books; for about that time Wicklef and Husse growing terrible were they who first drove the papal court to a stricter policy of prohibiting. Which course Leo the Tenth and his successors followed, until the council of Trent and the Spanish inquisition, engendering together, brought forth or perfected those catalogues and expurging indexes that rake through the entrails of many an old good author with a violation worse than any could be offered to his tomb.

Nor did they stay in matters heretical, but any subject that was not to their palate, they either condemned in a prohibition, or had it straight into the new purgatory of an index. To fill up the measure of encroachment, their last invention was to ordain that no book, pamphlet, or paper should be printed (as if St. Peter had bequeathed them the keys of the press also as well as of Paradise) unless it were approved and licensed under the hands of two or three gluttonous friars. For example:

"Let the chancellor Cini be pleased to see if in this present work be "contained aught that may withstand the printing.
"Vincent Rabatta, Vicar of Florence."

"I have seen this present work, and find nothing athwart the "Catholic faith and good manners: in witness whereof I have "given, &c.
"Nicolò Cini, Chancellor of Florence."

"Attending the precedent relation, it is allowed that this present "work of Davanzati may be printed.
"Vincent Rabatta," &c.

"It may be printed, July 15.
"Friar Simon Mompei d'Amelia, Chancellor of the Holy Office in Florence."

Sure they have a conceit, if he of the bottomless pit had not long since broke prison, that this quadruple exorcism would bar him down. I fear their next design will be to get into their custody the licensing of that which they say Claudius intended, but went not through with. Vouchsafe to see another of their forms, the Roman stamp:—

"Imprimatur, If it seem good to the reverend master of the Holy Palace.
"Belcastro, Vicegerent."

"Imprimatur,"
"Friar Nicolò, Rodolphi, Master of the Holy Palace."

Sometimes five imprimaturs are seen together, dialogue wise, in the piazza of one titlepage, complimenting and ducking each to other with their shaven reverences, whether the author, who stands by in perplexity at the foot of his epistle, shall to the press or to the sponge. These are the pretty responsories, these are the dear antiphonies, that so bewitched of late our prelates and their chaplains with the goodly echo they made; and besotted us to the gay imitation of a lordly imprimatur, one from Lambeth-house, another from the west end of Paul's; so apishly romanizing, that the word of command still was set down in Latin; as if the learned grammatical pen that wrote it would cast no ink without Latin; or perhaps, as they thought, because no vulgar tongue was worthy to express the pure conceit of an imprimatur; but rather, as I hope, for that our English, the language of men ever famous and foremost in the achievements of liberty, will not easily find servile letters enow to spell such a dictatory presumption Englished.

And thus ye have the inventors and the original of book licensing ripped up and drawn as lineally as any pedigree. We have it not, that can be heard of, from any ancient state, or polity, or church, nor by any statute left us by our ancestors elder or later; nor from the modern custom of any reformed city or church abroad; but from the most anti-christian council, and the most tyrannous inquisition that ever inquired. Till then books were ever as freely admitted into the world as any other birth; the issue of the brain was no more stifled than the issue of the womb: no envious Juno sat cross-legged over the nativity of any man's intellectual offspring; but if it proved a monster, who denies but that it was justly burnt, or sunk into the sea? But that a book, in worse condition than a peccant soul, should be to stand before a jury ere it be born to the world, and undergo yet in darkness the judgment of Radamanth and his colleagues, ere it can pass the ferry backward into light, was never heard before, till that mysterious iniquity, provoked and troubled at the first entrance of reformation, sought out new limboes and new hells wherein they might include our books also within the number of their damned. And this was the rare morsel so officiously snatched up and so illfavouredly imitated by our inquisiturient bishops, and the attendant minorites, their chaplains. That ye like not now these most certain authors of this licensing order, and that all sinister intention was far distant from your thoughts when ye were importuned the passing it, all men who know the integrity of your actions, and how ye honour truth, will clear ye readily.

But some will say, what though the inventors were bad, the thing for all that may be good. It may be so; yet if that thing be no such deep invention, but obvious and easy for any man to light on, and yet best and wisest commonwealths through all ages and occasions have forborne to use it, and falsest seducers and oppressors of men were the first who took it up, and to no other purpose but to obstruct and hinder the first approach of reformation; I am of those who believe, it will be a harder alchymy than Lullius ever knew, to sublimate any good use out of such an invention. Yet this only is what I request to gain from this reason, that it may be held a dangerous and suspicious fruit, as certainly it deserves, for the tree that bore it, until I can dissect one by one the properties it has. But I have first to finish, as was propounded, what is to be thought in general of reading books, whatever sort they be, and whether be more the benefit or the harm that thence proceeds.

Not to insist upon the examples of Moses, Daniel, and Paul, who were skilful in all the learning of the Egyptians, Chaldeans, and Greeks, which could not probably be without reading their books of all sorts, in Paul especially, who thought it no defilement to insert into holy scripture the sentences of three Greek poets, and one of them a tragedian; the question was notwithstanding sometimes controverted among the primitive doctors, but with great odds on that side which affirmed it both lawful and profitable, as was then evidently perceived, when Julian the Apostate, and subtlest enemy to our faith, made a decree forbidding Christians the study of heathen learning; for, said he, they wound us with our own weapons, and with our own arts and sciences they overcome us. And indeed the Christians were put so to their shifts by this crafty means, and so much in danger to decline into all ignorance, that the two Apollinarii were fain, as a man may say, to coin all the seven liberal sciences out of the Bible, reducing it into divers forms of orations, poems, dialogues, even to the calculating of a new Christian grammar.

But, saith the historian Socrates, the providence of God provided better than the industry of Apollinarius and his son, by taking away that illiterate law with the life of him who devised it. So great an injury they then held it to be deprived of Hellenic learning; and thought it a persecution more undermining and secretly decaying the church than the open cruelty of Decius or Diocletian. And perhaps it was with the same politic drift that the devil whipt St. Jerome in a lenten dream, for reading Cicero; or else it was a phantasm, bred by the fever which had then seized him. For had an angel been his discipliner, unless it were for dwelling too much on Ciceronianisms, and had chastised the reading, not the vanity, it had been plainly partial, first, to correct him for grave Cicero, and not for scurril Plautus, whom he confesses to have been reading not long before; next to correct him only, and let so many more ancient fathers wax old in those pleasant and florid studies, without the lash of such a tutoring apparition; insomuch that Basil teaches how some good use may be made of Margites, a sportful poem, not now extant, writ by Homer; and why not then of Morgante, an Italian romance much to the same purpose?

But if it be agreed we shall be tried by visions, there is a vision recorded by Eusebius, far ancienter than this tale of Jerome, to the nun Eustochium, and besides, has nothing of a fever in it. Dionysius Alexandrinus was, about the year 240, a person of great name in the church for piety and learning, who had wont to avail himself much against heretics, by being conversant in their books; until a certain presbyter laid it scrupulously to his conscience, how he durst venture himself among those defiling volumes. The worthy man, loath to give offence, fell into a new debate with himself, what was to be thought; when suddenly a vision sent from God (it is his own epistle that so avers it) confirmed him in these words: "Read any books whatever come to thy hands, for thou art sufficient both to judge aright and to examine each matter." To this revelation he assented the sooner, as he confesses, because it was answerable to that of the apostle to the Thessalonians: "Prove all things, hold fast that which is good."

And he might have added another remarkable saying of the same author: "To the pure, all things are pure;" not only meats and drinks, but all kind of knowledge, whether of good or evil: the knowledge cannot defile, nor consequently the books, if the will and conscience be not defiled. For books are as meat and viands are; some of good, some of evil substance; and yet God in that unapocryphal vision said without exception, "Rise, Peter, kill and eat;" leaving the choice to each man's discretion. Wholesome meats to a vitiated stomach differ little or nothing from unwholesome; and best books to a naughty mind are not unapplicable to occasions of evil. Bad meats will scarce breed good nourishment in the healthiest concoction; but herein the difference is of bad books, that they to a discreet and judicious reader serve in many respects to discover, to confute, to forewarn, and to illustrate. Whereof what better witness can ye expect I should produce, than one of your own now sitting in parliament, the chief of learned men reputed in this land, Mr. Selden; whose volume of natural and national laws proves, not only by great authorities brought together, but by exquisite reasons and theorems almost mathematically demonstrative, that all opinions, yea, errors, known, read, and collated, are of main service and assistance toward the speedy attainment of what is truest.

I conceive, therefore, that when God did enlarge the universal diet of man's body, (saving ever the rules of temperance,) he then also, as before, left arbitrary the dieting and repasting of our minds; as wherein every mature man might have to exercise his own leading capacity. How great a virtue is temperance, how much of moment through the whole life of man! Yet God commits the managing so great a trust, without particular law or prescription, wholly to the demeanour of every grown man. And therefore when he himself tabled the Jews from heaven, that omer, which was every man's daily portion of manna, is computed to have been more than might have well sufficed the heartiest feeder thrice as many meals. For those actions which enter into a man, rather than issue out of him, and therefore defile not, God uses not to captivate under a perpetual childhood of prescription, but trusts him with the gift of reason to be his own chooser; there were but little work left for preaching, if law and compulsion should grow so fast upon those things which heretofore were governed only by exhortation. Solomon informs us that much reading is a weariness to the flesh; but neither he nor other inspired author tells us that such or such reading is unlawful; yet certainly had God thought good to limit us herein, it had been much more expedient to have told us what was unlawful than what was wearisome.

As for the burning of those Ephesian books by St. Paul's converts; it is replied, the books were magic, the Syriac so renders them. It was a private act, a voluntary act, and leaves us to a voluntary imitation: the men in remorse burnt those books which were their own; the magistrate by this example is not appointed; these men practised the books, another might perhaps have read them in some sort usefully. Good and evil we know in the field of this world grow up together almost inseparably; and the knowledge of good is so involved and interwoven with the knowledge of evil, and in so many cunning resemblances hardly to be discerned, that those confused seeds which were imposed upon Psyche as an incessant labour to cull out and sort asunder, were not more intermixed. It was from out the rind of one apple tasted that the knowledge of good and evil, as two twins cleaving together, leaped forth into the world. And perhaps this is that doom which Adam fell into of knowing good and evil; that is to say, of knowing good by evil.

As therefore the state of man now is, what wisdom can there be to choose, what continence to forbear, without the knowledge of evil? He that can apprehend and consider vice with all her baits and seeming pleasures, and yet abstain, and yet distinguish, and yet prefer that which is truly better, he is the true warfaring Christian. I cannot praise a fugitive and cloistered virtue unexercised and unbreathed, that never sallies out and seeks her adversary, but slinks out of the race, where that immortal garland is to be run for, not without dust and heat. Assuredly we bring not innocence into the world, we bring impurity much rather; that which purifies us is trial, and trial is by what is contrary. That virtue therefore which is but a youngling in the contemplation of evil, and knows not the utmost that vice promises to her followers, and rejects it, is but a blank virtue, not a pure; her whiteness is but an excremental whiteness; which was the reason why our sage and serious poet Spenser, (whom I dare be known to think a better teacher than Scotus or Aquinas,) describing true temperance under the person of Guion, brings him in with his palmer through the cave of Mammon, and the bower of earthly bliss, that he might see and know, and yet abstain.

Since therefore the knowledge and survey of vice is in this world so necessary to the constituting of human virtue, and the scanning of error to the confirmation of truth, how can we more safely, and with less danger, scout into the regions of sin and falsity, than by reading all manner of tractates, and hearing all manner of reason? And this is the benefit which may be had of books promiscuously read. But of the harm that may result hence, three kinds are usually reckoned. First, is feared the infection that may spread; but then, all human learning and controversy in religious points must remove out of the world, yea, the Bible itself; for that ofttimes relates blasphemy not nicely, it describes the carnal sense of wicked men not unelegantly, it brings in holiest men passionately murmuring against Providence through all the arguments of Epicurus: in other great disputes it answers dubiously and darkly to the common reader; and ask a Talmudist what ails the modesty of his marginal Keri, that Moses and all the prophets cannot persuade him to pronounce the textual Chetiv. For these causes we all know the Bible itself put by the papist into the first rank of prohibited books. The ancientest fathers must be next removed, as Clement of Alexandria, and that Eusebian book of evangelic preparation, transmitting our ears through a hoard of heathenish obscenities to receive the gospel. Who finds not that Irenæus, Epiphanius, Jerome, and others discover more heresies than they well confute, and that oft for heresy which is the truer opinion?

Nor boots it to say for these, and all the heathen writers of greatest infection, if it must be thought so, with whom is bound up the life of human learning, that they wrote in an unknown tongue, so long as we are sure those languages are known as well to the worst of men, who are both most able and most diligent to instil the poison they suck, first into the courts of princes, acquainting them with the choicest delights, and criticisms of sin. As perhaps did that Petronius, whom Nero called his arbiter, the master of his revels; and that notorious ribald of Arezzo, dreaded and yet dear to the Italian courtiers. I name not him, for posterity's sake, whom Henry the Eighth named in merriment his vicar of hell. By which compendious way all the contagion that foreign books can infuse will find a passage to the people far easier and shorter than an Indian voyage, though it could be sailed either by the north of Catalo eastward or of Canada westward, while our Spanish licensing gags the English press never so severely.

But, on the other side, that infection which is from books of controversy in religion is more doubtful and dangerous to the learned than to the ignorant; and yet those books must be permitted untouched by the licenser. It will be hard to instance where any ignorant man hath been ever seduced by any papistical book in English, unless it were commended and expounded to him by some of that clergy; and indeed all such tractates, whether false or true, are as the prophecy of Isaiah was to the eunuch, not to be understood without a guide. But of our priests and doctors how many have been corrupted by studying the comments of Jesuits and Sorbonists, and how fast they could transfuse that corruption into the people, our experience is both late and sad. It is not forgot since the acute and distinct Arminius was perverted merely by the perusing of a nameless discourse written at Delft, which at first he took in hand to confute.

Seeing therefore that those books, and those in great abundance, which are likeliest to taint both life and doctrine, cannot be suppressed without the fall of learning and of all ability in disputation, and that these books of either sort are most and soonest catching to the learned, (from whom to the common people whatever is heretical or dissolute may quickly be conveyed,) and that evil manners are as perfectly learnt without books a thousand other ways which cannot be stopped, and evil doctrine not with books can propagate, except a teacher guide, which he might also do without writing, and so beyond prohibiting; I am not able to unfold how this cautelous enterprise of licensing can be exempted from the number of vain and impossible attempts. And he who were pleasantly disposed could not well avoid to liken it to the exploit of that gallant man who thought to pound up the crows by shutting his park gate.

Besides another inconvenience, if learned men be the first receivers out of books, and dispreaders both of vice and error, how shall the licensers themselves be confided in, unless we can confer upon them, or they assume to themselves, above all others in the land, the grace of infallibility and uncorruptedness? And again, if it be true that a wise man, like a good refiner, can gather gold out of the drossiest volume, and that a fool will be a fool with the best book, yea, or without book; there is no reason that we should deprive a wise man of any advantage to his wisdom, while we seek to restrain from a fool that which being restrained will be no hindrance to his folly. For if there should be so much exactness always used to keep that from him which is unfit for his reading, we should, in the judgment of Aristotle not only but of Solomon and of our Saviour, not vouchsafe him good precepts, and by consequence not willingly admit him to good books; as being certain that a wise man will make better use of an idle pamphlet than a fool will do of sacred scripture.

It is next alleged, that we must not expose ourselves to temptations without necessity, and next to that, not employ our time in vain things. To both these objections one answer will serve, out of the grounds already laid, that to all men such books are not temptations, nor vanities; but useful drugs and materials wherewith to temper and compose effective and strong medicines, which man's life cannot want. The rest, as children and childish men, who have not the art to qualify and prepare these working minerals, well may be exhorted to forbear; but hindered forcibly they cannot be, by all the licensing that sainted inquisition could ever yet contrive; which is what I promised to deliver next: that this order of licensing conduces nothing to the end for which it was framed; and hath almost prevented me by being clear already while thus much hath been explaining. See the ingenuity of Truth, who, when she gets a free and willing hand, opens herself faster than the pace of method and discourse can overtake her. It was the task which I began with, to shew that no nation, or well instituted state, if they valued books at all, did ever use this way of licensing; and it might be answered, that this is a piece of prudence lately discovered.

To which I return, that as it was a thing slight and obvious to think on, so if it had been difficult to find out, there wanted not among them long since who suggested such a course; which they not following leave us a pattern of their judgment that it was not the not knowing, but the not approving, which was the cause of their not using it. Plato, a man of high authority indeed, but least of all for his Commonwealth, in the book of his laws, which no city ever yet received, fed his fancy with making many edicts to his airy burgomasters, which they who otherwise admire him wish had been rather buried and excused in the genial cups of an academic night sitting. By which laws he seems to tolerate no kind of learning, but by unalterable decree, consisting most of practical traditions, to the attainment whereof a library of smaller bulk than his own dialogues would be abundant. And there also enacts, that no poet should so much as read to any private man what he had written until the judges and law keepers had seen it and allowed it; but that Plato meant this law peculiarly to that commonwealth which he had imagined, and to no other, is evident. Why was he not else a lawgiver to himself, but a transgressor, and to be expelled by his own magistrates, both for the wanton epigrams and dialogues which he made, and his perpetual reading of Sophron Mimus and Aristophanes, books of grossest infamy; and also for commending the latter of them, though he were the malicious libeller of his chief friends, to be read by the tyrant Dionysius, who had little need of such trash to spend his time on? But that he knew this licensing of poems had reference and dependence to many other provisoes there set down in his fancied republic, which in this world could have no place; and so neither he himself, nor any magistrate or city, ever imitated that course, which, taken apart from those other collateral injunctions, must needs be vain and fruitless.

For if they fell upon one kind of strictness, unless their care were equal to regulate all other things of like aptness to corrupt the mind, that single endeavour they knew would be but a fond labour; to shut and fortify one gate against corruption, and be necessitated to leave others round about wide open. If we think to regulate printing, thereby to rectify manners, we must regulate all recreations and pastimes, all that is delightful to man. No music must be heard, no song be set or sung, but what is grave and Doric. There must be licensing dancers, that no gesture, motion, or deportment be taught our youth, but what by their allowance shall be thought honest; for such Plato was provided of. It will ask more than the work of twenty licensers, to examine all the lutes, the violins, and the guitars in every house; they must not be suffered to prattle as they do, but must be licensed what they may say. And who shall silence all the airs and madrigals that whisper softness in chambers? The windows also, and the balconies, must be thought on; there are shrewd books with dangerous frontispieces set to sale: who shall prohibit them, shall twenty licensers? The villages also must have their visitors to inquire what lectures the bagpipe and the rebec reads, even to the ballatry and the gamut of every municipal fiddler, for these are the countryman's Arcadias and his monte mayors.

Next, what more national corruption, for which England hears ill abroad, than household gluttony? Who shall be the rectors of our daily rioting? And what shall be done to inhibit the multitudes that frequent those houses where drunkenness is sold and harboured? Our garments also should be referred to the licensing of some more sober work masters, to see them cut into a less wanton garb. Who shall regulate all the mixed conversation of our youth, male and female together, as is the fashion of this country? Who shall still appoint what shall be discoursed, what presumed, and no further? Lastly, who shall forbid and separate all idle resort, all evil company? These thing will be, and must be; but how they shall be least hurtful, how least enticing, herein consists the grave and governing wisdom of a state.

To sequester out of the world into Atlantic and Utopian politics, which never can be drawn into use, will not mend our condition; but to ordain wisely as in this world of evil, in the midst whereof God hath placed us unavoidably. Nor is it Plato's licensing of books will do this, which necessarily pulls along with it so many other kinds of licensing as will make us all both ridiculous and weary, and yet frustrate; but those unwritten, or at least unconstraining laws of virtuous education, religious and civil nurture, which Plato there mentions as the bonds and ligaments of the commonwealth, the pillars and the sustainers of every written statute; these they be which will bear chief sway in such matters as these, when all licensing will be easily eluded. Impunity and remissness for certain are the bane of a commonwealth; but here the great art lies, to discern in what the law is to bid restraint and punishment, and in what things persuasion only is to work. If every action which is good or evil in man at ripe years were to be under pittance, prescription, and compulsion, what were virtue but a name, what praise could be then due to well doing, what gramercy to be sober, just, or continent?

Many there be that complain of divine Providence for suffering Adam to transgress. Foolish tongues! When God gave him reason He gave him freedom to choose, for reason is but choosing; he had been else a mere artificial Adam, such an Adam as he is in the motions (puppet shows). We ourselves esteem not of that obedience, or love, or gift, which is of force; God therefore left him free, set before him a provoking object ever almost in his eyes; herein consisted his merit, herein the right of his reward, the praise of his abstinence. Wherefore did he create passions within us, pleasure roundabout us, but that these rightly tempered are the very ingredients of virtue? They are not skilful considerers of human things who imagine to remove sin by removing the matter of sin; for, besides that it is a huge heap increasing under the very act of diminishing, though some part of it may for a time be withdrawn from some persons, it cannot from all, in such a universal thing as books are; and when this is done, yet the sin remains entire. Though ye take from a covetous man all his treasure, he has yet one jewel left, ye cannot bereave him of his covetousness. Banish all objects of lust, shut up all youth into the severest discipline that can be exercised in any hermitage, ye cannot make them chaste that came not thither so: such great care and wisdom is required to the right managing of this point.

Suppose we could expel sin by this means; look how much we thus expel of sin, so much we expel of virtue: for the matter of them both is the same: remove that, and ye remove them both alike. This justifies the high providence of God, who, though he commands us temperance, justice, continence, yet pours out before us even to a profuseness of all desirable things, and gives us minds that can wander beyond all limit and satiety. Why should we then affect a rigour contrary to the manner of God and of nature, by abridging or scanting those means, which books freely permitted are, both to the trial of virtue and the exercise of truth?

It would be better done, to learn that the law must needs be frivolous which goes to restrain things uncertainly and yet equally working to good and to evil. And were I the chooser, a dram of well-doing should be preferred before many times as much the forcible hindrance of evil doing. For God sure esteems the growth and completing of one virtuous person more than the restraint of ten vicious. And albeit whatever thing we hear or see, sitting, walking, travelling, or conversing, may be fitly called our book, and is of the same effect that writings are; yet grant the thing to be prohibited were only books, it appears that this order hitherto is far insufficient to the end which it intends. Do we not see, not once or oftener, but weekly, that continued court libel (the "Mercurius Aulicus," a royalist weekly paper.—Ed.) against the parliament and city, printed, as the wet sheets can witness, and dispersed among us for all that licensing can do? Yet this is the prime service, a man would think, wherein this order should give proof of itself. If it were executed, you will say. But, certain, if execution be remiss or blindfold now, and in this particular, what will it be hereafter, and in other books?

If then the order shall not be vain and frustrate, behold a new labour, lords and commons, ye must repeal and proscribe all scandalous and unlicensed books already printed and divulged; after ye have drawn them up into a list, that all may know which are condemned, and which not; and ordain that no foreign books be delivered out of custody, till they have been read over. This office will require the whole time of not a few overseers, and those no vulgar men. There be also books which are partly useful and excellent, partly culpable and pernicious; this work will ask as many more officials, to make expurgations and expunctions, that the commonwealth of learning be not damnified. In fine, when the multitude of books increase upon their hands, ye must be fain to catalogue all those printers who are found frequently offending, and forbid the importation of their whole suspected typography. In a word, that this your order may be exact, and not deficient, ye must reform it perfectly, according to the model of Trent and Sevil, which I know ye abhor to do.

Yet though ye should condescend to this, which God forbid, the order still would be but fruitless and defective to that end whereto ye meant it. If to prevent sects and schisms, who is so unread or uncatechised in story that hath not heard of many sects refusing books as a hindrance, and preserving their doctrine unmixed for many ages, only by unwritten traditions? The Christian faith (for that was once a schism) is not unknown to have spread all over Asia ere any gospel or epistle was seen in writing. If the amendment of manners be aimed at, look into Italy and Spain, whether those places be one scruple the better, the honester, the wiser, the chaster, since all the inquisitional rigour that hath been executed upon books.

Another reason, whereby to make it plain that this order will miss the end it seeks, consider by the quality which ought to be in every licenser. It cannot be denied, but that he who is made judge to sit upon the birth or death of books, whether they may be wafted into this world or not, had need to be a man above the common measure, both studious, learned, and judicious; there may be else no mean mistakes in the censure of what is passable or not; which is also no mean injury.

If he be of such worth as behooves him, there cannot be a more tedious and unpleasing journeywork, a greater loss of time levied upon his head, than to be made the perpetual reader of unchosen books and pamphlets, ofttimes huge volumes. There is no book that is acceptable, unless at certain seasons; but to be enjoined the reading of that at all times, and in a hand scarce legible, whereof three pages would not down at any time in the fairest print, is an imposition I cannot believe how he that values time, and his own studies, or is but of a sensible nostril, should be able to endure. In this one thing I crave leave of the present licensers to be pardoned for so thinking: who doubtless took this office up, looking on it through their obedience to the parliament, whose command perhaps made all things seem easy and unlaborious to them; but that this short trial hath wearied them out already, their own expressions and excuses to them who make so many journeys to solicit their licence are testimony enough. Seeing, therefore, those who now possess the employment by all evident signs wish themselves well rid of it, and that no man of worth, none that is not a plain unthrift of his own hours, is ever likely to succeed them, except he mean to put himself to the salary of a press corrector, we may easily foresee what kind of licensers we are to expect hereafter, either ignorant, imperious, and remiss, or basely pecuniary. This is what I had to show, wherein this order cannot conduce to that end whereof it bears the intention.

I lastly proceed from the no good it can do, to the manifest hurt it causes, in being first the greatest discouragement and affront that can be offered to learning and to learned men. It was the complaint and lamentation of prelates, upon every least of a motion to remove pluralities and distribute more equally church revenues, that then all learning would be forever dashed and discouraged. But as for that opinion, I never found cause to think that the tenth part of learning stood or fell with the clergy; nor could I ever but hold it for a sordid and unworthy speech of any churchman who had a competency left him. If therefore ye be loath to dishearten utterly and discontent, not the mercenary crew of false pretenders to learning, but the free and ingenuous sort of such as evidently were born to study and love learning for itself, not for lucre, or any other end, but the service of God and of truth, and perhaps that lasting fame and perpetuity of praise, which God and good men have consented shall be the reward of those whose published labours advance the good of mankind: then know, that so far to distrust the judgment and the honesty of one who hath but a common repute in learning, and never yet offended, as not to count him fit to print his mind without a tutor and examiner, lest he should drop a schism or something of corruption, is the greatest displeasure and indignity to a free and knowing spirit that can be put upon him.

What advantage is it to be a man over it is to be a boy at school, if we have only escaped the ferula to come under the fescue of an imprimatur? if serious and elaborate writings, as if they were no more than the theme of a grammar-lad under his pedagogue, must not be uttered without the cursory eyes of a temporizing and extemporizing licenser? He who is not trusted with his own actions, his drift not being known to be evil, and standing to the hazard of law and penalty, has no great argument to think himself reputed in the commonwealth wherein he was born for other than a fool or a foreigner. When a man writes to the world, he summons up all his reason and deliberation to assist him; he searches, meditates, is industrious, and likely consults and confers with his judicious friends; after all which done, he takes himself to be informed in what he writes as well as any that wrote before him; if in this, the most consummate act of his fidelity and ripeness, no years, no industry, no former proof of his abilities, can bring him to that state of maturity as not to be still mistrusted and suspected, unless he carry all his considerate diligence, all his midnight watchings, and expense of Palladian oil, to the hasty view of an unleisured licenser, perhaps much his younger, perhaps far his inferior in judgment, perhaps one who never knew the labour of bookwriting; and if he be not repulsed, or slighted, must appear in print like a puny with his guardian, and his censor's hand on the back of his title to be his bail and surety that he is no idiot or seducer; it cannot be but a dishonour and derogation to the author, to the book, to the privilege and dignity of learning.

And what if the author shall be one so copious of fancy as to have many things well worth the adding come into his mind after licensing, while the book is yet under the press, which not seldom happens to the best and diligentest writers; and that perhaps a dozen times in one book. The printer dares not go beyond his licensed copy; so often then must the author trudge to his leave-giver, that those his new insertions may be viewed; and many a jaunt will be made, ere that licenser, for it must be the same man, can either be found, or found at leisure; meanwhile either the press must stand still, which is no small damage, or the author lose his accuratest thoughts, and send the book forth worse than he had made it, which to a diligent writer is the greatest melancholy and vexation that can befall.

And how can a man teach with authority, which is the life of teaching; how can he be a doctor in his book, as he ought to be, or else had better be silent, whenas all he teaches, all be delivers, is but under the tuition, under the correction of his patriarchal licenser, to blot or alter what precisely accords not with the hide-bound humour which he calls his judgment?

When every acute reader, upon the first sight of a pedantic licence, will be ready with these like words to ding the book a quoit's distance from him: "I hate a pupil teacher; I endure not an instructor that comes to me under the wardship of an overseeing fist. I know nothing of the licenser, but that I have his own hand here for his arrogance; who shall warrant me his judgment?" "The state, sir," replies the stationer: but has a quick return: "The state shall be my governors, but not my critics; they may be mistaken in the choice of a licenser, as easily as this license may be mistaken in an author. This is some common stuff:" and he might add from Sir Francis Bacon, that "such authorized books are but the language of the times." For though a licenser should happen to be judicious more than ordinary, which will be a great jeopardy of the next succession, yet his very office and his commission enjoins him to let pass nothing but what is vulgarly received already.

Nay, which is more lamentable, if the work of any deceased author, though never so famous in his lifetime, and even to this day, comes to their hands for licence to be printed, or reprinted, if there be found in his book one sentence of a venturous edge, uttered in the height of zeal, (and who knows whether it might not be the dictate of a divine spirit?) yet not suiting with every low decrepit humour of their own, though it were Knox himself, the reformer of a kingdom, that spake it, they will not pardon him their dash (forego their erasure.—Ed.); the sense of that great man shall to all posterity be lost, for the fearfulness or the presumptuous rashness of a perfunctory licenser. And to what an author this violence hath been lately done, and in what book, of greatest consequence to be faithfully published, I could now instance, but shall forbear till a more convenient season. Yet if these things be not resented seriously and timely by them who have the remedy in their power, but that such ironmoulds as these shall have authority to gnaw out the choicest periods of exquisitest books, and to commit such a treacherous fraud against the orphan remainders of worthiest men after death, the more sorrow will belong to that hapless race of men whose misfortune it is to have understanding. Henceforth let no man care to learn, or care to be more than worldly wise; for certainly in higher matters to be ignorant and slothful, to be a common steadfast dunce, will be the only pleasant life, and only in request.

And as it is a particular disesteem of every knowing person alive, and most injurious to the written labours and monuments of the dead, so to me it seems an undervaluing and vilifying of the whole nation. I cannot set so light by all the invention, the art, the wit, the grave and solid judgment which is in England, as that it can be comprehended in any twenty capacities, how good soever; much less that it should not pass except their superintendence be over it, except it be sifted and strained with their strainers, that it should be uncurrent without their mutual stamp. Truth and understanding are not such wares as to be monopolized and traded in by tickets, and statutes, and standards. We must not think to make a staple commodity of all the knowledge in the land, to mark and license it like our broad-cloth and our wool-packs. What is it but a servitude like that imposed by the Philistines, not to be allowed the sharpening of our own axes and coulters, but we must repair from all quarters to twenty licensing forges?

Had any one written and divulged erroneous things and scandalous to honest life, misusing and forfeiting the esteem had of his reason among men, if after conviction this only censure were adjudged him, that he should never henceforth write but what were first examined by an appointed officer, whose hand should be annexed to pass his credit for him that now he might be safely read; it could not be apprehended less than a disgraceful punishment. Whence to include the whole nation, and those that never yet thus offended, under such a diffident and suspectful prohibition, may plainly be understood what a disparagement it is. So much the more when as debtors and delinquents may walk abroad without a keeper, but unoffensive books must not stir forth without a visible jailor in their title. Nor is it to the common people less than a reproach; for if we be so jealous over them as that we dare not trust them with an English pamphlet, what do we but censure them for a giddy, vicious, and ungrounded people; in such a sick and weak state of faith and discretion as to be able to take nothing down but through the pipe of a licenser? That this is care or love of them we cannot pretend, when as in those popish places, where the laity are most hated and despised, the same strictness is used over them. Wisdom we cannot call it, because it stops but one breach of licence, nor that neither when as those corruptions which it seeks to prevent break in faster at other doors which cannot be shut.

And in conclusion it reflects to the disrepute of our ministers also, of whose labours we should hope better, and of their proficiency which their flock reaps by them, than that after all this light of the gospel which is, and is to be, and all this continual preaching, they should be still frequented with such an unprincipled, unedified, and laic rabble as that the whiff of every new pamphlet should stagger them out of their catechism and Christian walking. This may have much reason to discourage the ministers, when such a low conceit is had of all their exhortations, and the benefiting of their hearers, as that they are not thought fit to be turned loose to three sheets of paper without a licenser; that all the sermons, all the lectures preached, printed, vended in such numbers and such volumes as have now well-nigh made all other books unsaleable, should not be armour enough against one single Enchiridion, without the castle of St. Angelo of an imprimatur.

And lest some should persuade ye, lords and commons, that these arguments of learned men's discouragement at this your order are mere flourishes, and not real, I could recount what I have seen and heard in other countries, where this kind of inquisition tyrannizes; when I have sat among their learned men, (for that honour I had), and been counted happy to be born in such a place of philosophic freedom, as they supposed England was, while themselves did nothing but bemoan the servile condition into which learning amongst them was brought; that this was it which had damped the glory of Italian wits, that nothing had been there written now these many years but flattery and fustian. There it was that I found and visited the famous Galileo, grown old, a prisoner to the inquisition, for thinking in astronomy otherwise than the Franciscan and Dominican licensers thought. And though I knew that England then was groaning loudest under the prelatical yoke, nevertheless I took it as a pledge of future happiness, that other nations were so persuaded of her liberty.

Yet was it beyond my hope, that those worthies were then breathing in her air who should be her leaders to such a deliverance as shall never be forgotten by any revolution of time that this world hath to finish. When that was once begun it was as little in my fear that what words of complaint I heard among learned men of other parts uttered against the inquisition, the same I should hear by as learned men at home uttered in time of parliament against an order of licensing; and that so generally that when I had disclosed myself a companion of their discontent, I might say, if without envy, that he whom an honest quæstorship had endeared to the Sicilians was not more by them importuned against Verres than the favourable opinion which I had among many who honour ye, and are known and respected by ye, loaded me with entreaties and persuasions that I would not despair to lay together that which just reason should bring into my mind toward the removal of an undeserved thraldom upon learning.

That this is not, therefore, the disburdening of a particular fancy, but the common grievance of all those who had prepared their minds and studies above the vulgar pitch, to advance truth in others, and from others to entertain it, thus much may satisfy. And in their name I shall for neither friend nor foe conceal what the general murmur is; that if it come to inquisitioning again, and licensing, and that we are so timorous of ourselves, and suspicious of all men, as to fear each book, and the shaking of each leaf, before we know what the contents are; if some who but of late were little better than silenced from preaching, shall come now to silence us from reading, except what they please, it cannot be guessed what is intended by some but a second tyranny over learning, and will soon put it out of controversy that bishops and presbyters are the same to us, both name and thing.

That those evils of prelaty which before from five or six and twenty sees were distributively charged upon the whole people will now light wholly upon learning, is not obscure to us; whenas now the pastor of a small unlearned parish on the sudden shall be exalted archbishop over a large diocese of books, and yet not remove, but keep his other cure, too, a mystical pluralist. He who but of late cried down the sole ordination of every novice bachelor of art, and denied sole jurisdiction over the simplest parishioner, shall now at home in his private chair assume both these over worthiest and excellentest books and ablest authors that write them. This is not the covenants and protestations that we have made. This is not to put down prelacy; this is but to chop an episcopacy; this is but to translate the palace metropolitan from one kind of dominion into another; this is but an old canonical sleight of commuting our penance. To startle thus betimes at a mere unlicensed pamphlet, will, after a while, be afraid of every conventicle, and a while after will make a conventicle of every Christian meeting.

But I am certain that a state governed by the rules of justice and fortitude, or a church built and founded upon the rock of faith and true knowledge, can not be so pusillanimous. While things are yet not constituted in religion, that freedom of writing should be restrained by a discipline imitated from the prelates, and learned by them from the inquisition, to shut us up all again into the breast of a licenser, must needs give cause of doubt and discouragement to all learned and religious men; who cannot but discern the fineness of this politic drift, and who are the contrivers; that while bishops were to be baited down, then all presses might be open; it was the people's birthright and privilege in time of parliament, it was the breaking forth of light.

But now the bishops abrogated and voided out of the church, as if our reformation sought no more, but to make room for others into their seats under another name; the episcopal arts begin to bud again; the cruse of truth must run no more oil; liberty of printing must be enthralled again under a prelatical commission of twenty; the privilege of the people nullified; and, which is worse, the freedom of learning must groan again, and to her old fetters; all this the parliament yet sitting. Although their own late arguments and defences against the prelates might remember them that this obstructing violence meets for the most part with an event utterly opposite to the end which it drives at: instead of suppressing sects and schisms it raises them and invests them with a reputation: "The punishing of wits enhances their authority," saith the Viscount St. Albans; "and a forbidden writing is thought to be a certain spark of truth, that flies up in the faces of them who seek to tread it out." This order, therefore, may prove a nursing mother to sects, but I shall easily shew how it will be a stepdame to truth; and, first, by disenabling us to the maintenance of what is known already.

Well knows he who uses to consider that our faith and knowledge thrives by exercise, as well as our limbs and complexion. Truth is compared in scripture to a streaming fountain; if her waters flow not in a perpetual progression, they sicken into a muddy pool of conformity and tradition. A man may be a heretic in the truth, and if he believe things only because his pastor says so, or the assembly so determines, without knowing other reason, though his belief be true, yet the very truth he holds becomes his heresy. There is not any burden that some would gladlier post off to another than the charge and care of their religion. There be, who knows not that there be? of protestants and professors who live and die in as arrant an implicit faith as any lay papist of Loretto.

A wealthy man, addicted to his pleasure and to his profits, finds religion to be a traffic so entangled and of so many piddling accounts, that of all mysteries he cannot skill to keep a stock going upon that trade. What should he do? Fain he would have the name to be religious, fain he would bear up with his neighbors in that. What does he therefore, but resolves to give over toiling, and to find himself out some factor, to whose care and credit he may commit the whole managing of his religious affairs; some divine of note and estimation that must be. To him he adheres, resigns the whole warehouse of his religion, with all the locks and keys, into his custody, and indeed makes the very person of that man his religion; esteems his associating with him a sufficient evidence and commendatory of his own piety. So that a man may say his religion is now no more within himself, but is become a dividual movable, and goes and comes near him according as that good man frequents the house. He entertains him, gives him gifts, feasts him, lodges him; his religion comes home at night, prays, is liberally supped, and sumptuously laid to sleep; rises, is saluted, and after the malmsey, or some well-spiced bruage, and better breakfasted than He whose morning appetite would have gladly fed on green figs between Bethany and Jerusalem, his religion walks abroad at eight and leaves his kind entertainer in the shop trading all day without his religion.

Another sort there be who when they hear that all things shall be ordered, all things regulated and settled, nothing written but what passes through the custom-house of certain publicans that have the tonnaging and poundaging of all free-spoken truth, will straight give themselves up into your hands, make them and cut them out what religion ye please: there be delights, there be recreations and jolly pastimes, that will fetch the day about from sun to sun and rock the tedious year as in a delightful dream. What need they torture their heads with that which others have taken so strictly and so unalterably into their own purveying? These are the fruits which a dull ease and cessation of our knowledge will bring forth among the people. How goodly and how to be wished were such an obedient unanimity as this! What a fine conformity would it starch us all into! Doubtless a staunch and solid piece of framework as any January could freeze together.

Nor much better will be the consequence even among the clergy themselves: it is no new thing never heard of before for a parochial minister, who has his reward and is at his Hercules' pillars in a warm benefice, to be easily inclinable, if he have nothing else that may rouse up his studies, to finish his circuit in an English concordance and a topic folio, the gatherings and savings of a sober graduateship, a Harmony and a Catena, treading the constant round of certain common doctrinal heads, attended with their uses, motives, marks, and means; out of which, as out of an alphabet or sol-fa, by forming and transforming, joining and disjoining variously, a little bookcraft and two hours' meditation might furnish him unspeakably to the performance of more than a weekly charge of sermoning: not to reckon up the infinite helps of interlinearies, breviaries, synopses, and other loitering gear. But as for the multitude of sermons ready printed and piled up, on every text that is not difficult, our London trading St. Thomas in his vestry, and add to boot St. Martin and St. Hugh, have not within their hallowed limits more vendible ware of all sorts ready made; so that penury he never need fear of pulpit provision, having where so plenteously to refresh his magazine. But if his rear and flanks be not impaled, if his back door be not secured by the rigid licenser, but that a bold book may now and then issue forth and give the assault to some of his old collections in their trenches, it will concern him then to keep waking, to stand in watch, to set good guards and sentinels about his received opinions, to walk the round and counter-round with his fellow-inspectors, fearing lest any of his flock be seduced, who also then would be better instructed, better exercised and disciplined. And God send that the fear of this diligence, which must then be used, do not make us affect the laziness of a licensing church.

For if we be sure we are in the right, and do not hold the truth guiltily, which becomes not, if we ourselves condemn not our own weak and frivolous teaching, and the people for an untaught and irreligious gadding rout; what can be more fair than when a man judicious, learned, and of a conscience, for aught we know, as good as theirs that taught us what we know, shall not privily from house to house, which is more dangerous, but openly by writing, publish to the world what his opinion is, what his reasons, and wherefore that which is now thought cannot be sound? Christ urged it as wherewith to justify himself, that he preached in public; yet writing is more public than preaching, and more easy to refutation if need be, there being so many whose business and profession merely it is to be the champions of truth; which if they neglect, what can be imputed but their sloth or inability?

Thus much we are hindered and disinured by this course of licensing toward the true knowledge of what we seem to know. For how much it hurts and hinders the licensers themselves in the calling of their ministry, more than any secular employment, if they will discharge that office as they ought, so that of necessity they must neglect either the one duty or the other, I insist not, because it is a particular, but leave it to their own conscience, how they will decide it there.

There is yet behind of what I purposed to lay open, the incredible loss and detriment that this plot of licensing puts us to. More than if some enemy at sea should stop up all our havens, and ports, and creeks, it hinders and retards the importation of our richest merchandise,—truth: nay, it was first established and put in practice by anti-Christian malice and mystery, on set purpose to extinguish, if it were possible, the light of reformation, and to settle falsehood; little differing from that policy wherewith the Turk upholds his Alcoran, by the prohibiting of printing. It is not denied, but gladly confessed, we are to send our thanks and vows to heaven louder than most of nations for that great measure of truth which we enjoy, especially in those main points between us and the Pope, with his appurtenances the prelates: but he who thinks we are to pitch our tent here, and have attained the utmost prospect of reformation that the mortal glass wherein we contemplate can shew us, till we come to beatific vision, that man by this very opinion declares that he is yet far short of truth.

Truth indeed came once into the world with her divine Master, and was a perfect shape most glorious to look on: but when He ascended, and his apostles after him were laid asleep, then straight arose a wicked race of deceivers, who, as that story goes of the Egyptian Typhon with his conspirators, how they dealt with the good Osiris, took the virgin Truth, hewed her lovely form into a thousand pieces, and scattered them to the four winds. From that time ever since, the sad friends of Truth, such as durst appear, imitating the careful search that Isis made for the mangled body of Osiris, went up and down gathering up limb by limb still as they could find them. We have not yet found them all, lords and commons, nor ever shall do, till her Master's second coming; he shall bring together every joint and member, and shall mould them into an immortal feature of loveliness and perfection. Suffer not these licensing prohibitions to stand at every place of opportunity forbidding and disturbing them that continue seeking, that continue to do our obsequies to the torn body of our martyred saint.

We boast our light; but if we look not wisely on the sun itself, it smites us into darkness. Who can discern those planets that are oft combust, and those stars of brightest magnitude that rise and set with the sun, until the opposite motion of their orbs bring them to such a place in the firmament, where they may be seen evening or morning? The light which we have gained was given us, not to be ever staring on, but by it to discover onward things more remote from our knowledge. It is not the unfrocking of a priest, the unmitring of a bishop, and the removing him from off the presbyterian shoulders, that will make us a happy nation: no; if other things as great in the church, and in the rule of life both economical and political, be not looked into and reformed, we have looked so long upon the blaze that Zuinglius and Calvin have beaconed up to us, that we are stark blind.

There be who perpetually complain of schisms and sects, and make it such a calamity that any man dissents from their maxims. It is their own pride and ignorance which causes the disturbing, who neither will hear with meekness, nor can convince, yet all must be suppressed which is not found in their Syntagma. They are the troublers, they are the dividers of unity, who neglect and permit not others to unite those dissevered pieces which are yet wanting to the body of Truth. To be still searching what we know not by what we know, still closing up truth to truth as we find it, (for all her body is homogeneal, and proportional,) this is the golden rule in theology as well as in arithmetic, and makes up the best harmony in a church; not the forced and outward union of cold and neutral and inwardly divided minds.

Lords and commons of England, consider what nation it is whereof ye are, and whereof ye are the governors: a nation not slow and dull, but of a quick, ingenious, and piercing spirit, acute to invent, subtile and sinewy to discourse, not beneath the reach of any point the highest that human capacity can soar to. Therefore the studies of learning in her deepest sciences have been so ancient and so eminent among us, that writers of good antiquity and able judgment have been persuaded that even the school of Pythagoras, and the Persian wisdom, took beginning from the old philosophy of this island. And that wise and civil Roman, Julius Agricola, who governed once here for Cæsar, preferred the natural wits of Britain before the laboured studies of the French. Nor is it for nothing that the grave and frugal Transylvanian sends out yearly from as far as the mountainous borders of Russia, and beyond the Hercynian wilderness, not their youth, but their staid men, to learn our language and our theologic arts. Yet that which is above all this, the favour and the love of Heaven, we have great argument to think in a peculiar manner propitious and propending toward us. Why else was this nation chosen before any other, that out of her, as out of Sion, should be proclaimed and sounded forth the first tidings and trumpet of reformation to all Europe? And had it not been the obstinate perverseness of our prelates against the divine and admirable spirit of Wicklef, to suppress him as a schismatic and innovator, perhaps neither the Bohemian Husse and Jerome, no, nor the name of Luther or of Calvin, had been ever known: the glory of reforming all our neighbours had been completely ours. But now, as our obdurate clergy have with violence demeaned the matter, we are become hitherto the latest and the backwardest scholars of whom God offered to have made us the teachers.

Now, once again by all concurrence of signs and by the general instinct of holy and devout men as they daily and solemnly express their thoughts, God is decreeing to begin some new and great period in his church, even to the reforming of reformation itself; what does he then but reveal himself to his servants, and as his manner is, first to his Englishmen? I say, as his manner is, first to us, though we mark not the method of his counsels, and are unworthy. Behold now this vast city, a city of refuge, the mansion-house of liberty, encompassed and surrounded with his protection; the shop of war hath not there more anvils and hammers working, to fashion out the plates and instruments of armed justice in defence of beleaguered truth than there be pens and heads there, sitting by their studious lamps, musing, searching, revolving new notions and ideas wherewith to present, as with their homage and their fealty, the approaching reformation: others as fast reading, trying all things, assenting to the force of reason and convincement.

What could a man require more from a nation so pliant and so prone to seek after knowledge? What wants there to such a towardly and pregnant soil but wise and faithful labourers to make a knowing people, a nation of prophets, of sages, and of worthies? We reckon more than five months yet to harvest; there need not be five weeks; had we but eyes to lift up, the fields are white already. Where there is much desire to learn, there of necessity will be much arguing, much writing, many opinions; for opinion in good men is but knowledge in the making. Under these fantastic terrors of sect and schism we wrong the earnest and zealous thirst after knowledge and understanding which God hath stirred up in this city. What some lament of we rather should rejoice at, should rather praise this pious forwardness among men to reassume the ill-deputed care of their religion into their own hands again. A little generous prudence, a little forbearance of one another, and some grain of charity might win all these diligences to join and unite into one general and brotherly search after truth; could we but forego this prelatical tradition of crowding free consciences and Christian liberties into canons and precepts of men. I doubt not if some great and worthy stranger should come among us, wise to discern the mould and temper of a people, and how to govern it, observing the high hopes and aims, the diligent alacrity of our extended thoughts and reasonings in the pursuance of truth and freedom, but that he would cry out as Pyrrhus did, admiring the Roman docility and courage, "If such were my Epirots, I would not despair the greatest design that could be attempted to make a church or kingdom happy."

Yet these are the men cried out against for schismatics and sectaries, as if, while the temple of the Lord was building, some cutting, some squaring the marble, others hewing the cedars, there should be a sort of irrational men who could not consider there must be many schisms and many dissections made in the quarry and in the timber ere the house of God can be built. And when every stone is laid artfully together, it cannot be united into a continuity, it can but be contiguous in this world: neither can every piece of the building be of one form; nay, rather the perfection consists in this, that out of many moderate varieties and brotherly dissimilitudes that are not vastly disproportional arises the goodly and the graceful symmetry that commends the whole pile and structure.

Let us therefore be more considerate builders, more wise in spiritual architecture, when great reformation is expected. For now the time seems come, wherein Moses, the great prophet, may sit in heaven rejoicing to see that memorable and glorious wish of his fulfilled, when not only our seventy elders but all the Lord's people are become prophets. No marvel then though some men, and some good men too perhaps, but young in goodness, as Joshua then was, envy them. They fret, and out of their own weakness are in agony, lest these divisions and subdivisions will undo us. The adversary again applauds, and waits the hour: when they have branched themselves out, saith he, small enough into parties and partitions, then will be our time. Fool! he sees not the firm root, out of which we all grow, though into branches; nor will beware, until he see our small divided maniples cutting through at every angle of his ill-united and unwieldly brigade. And that we are to hope better of all these supposed sects and schisms, and that we shall not need that solicitude, honest perhaps, though overtimorous, of them that vex in this behalf, but shall laugh in the end at those malicious applauders of our differences, I have these reasons to persuade me.

First, when a city shall be as it were besieged and blocked about, her navigable river infested, inroads and incursions round, defiance and battle oft rumoured to be marching up even to her wall and suburb trenches; that when the people, or the greater part, more than at other times, wholly taken up with the study of highest and most important matters to be reformed, should be disputing, reasoning, reading, inventing, discoursing, even to a rarity and admiration, things not before discoursed or written of, argues first a singular good will, contentedness, and confidence in your prudent foresight, and safe government, lords and commons; and from thence derives itself to a gallant bravery and well-grounded contempt of their enemies, as if there were no small number of as great spirits among us as his was who, when Rome was nigh besieged by Hannibal, being in the city, bought that piece of ground at no cheap rate whereon Hannibal himself encamped his own regiment.

Next, it is a lively and cheerful presage of our happy success and victory. For as in a body when the blood is fresh, the spirits pure and vigorous, not only to vital but to rational faculties, and those in the acutest and the pertest operations of wit and subtlety, it argues in what good plight and constitution the body is; so when the cheerfulness of the people is so sprightly up, as that it has not only wherewith to guard well its own freedom and safety, but to spare, and to bestow upon the solidest and sublimest points of controversy and new invention, it betokens us not degenerated, nor drooping to a fatal decay, but casting off the old and wrinkled skin of corruption to outlive these pangs, and wax young again, entering the glorious ways of truth and prosperous virtue, destined to become great and honourable in these latter ages. Methinks I see in my mind a noble and puissant nation rousing herself like a strong man after sleep, and shaking her invincible locks. Methinks I see her as an eagle mewing her mighty youth, and kindling her undazzled eyes at the full midday beam, purging and unscaling her long-abused sight at the fountain itself of heavenly radiance; while the whole noise of timorous and flocking birds, with those also that love the twilight, flutter about, amazed at what she means, and in their envious gabble would prognosticate a year of sects and schisms.

What should ye do then, should ye suppress all this flowery crop of knowledge and new light sprung up and yet springing daily in this city, should ye set an oligarchy of twenty engrossers over it, to bring a famine upon our minds again, when we shall know nothing but what is measured to us by their bushel? Believe it, lords and commons, they who counsel ye to such a suppressing do as good as bid ye suppress yourselves; and I will soon shew how. If it be desired to know the immediate cause of all this free writing and free speaking, there cannot be assigned a truer than your own mild and free and humane government; it is the liberty, lords and commons, which your own valorous and happy counsels have purchased us; liberty which is the nurse of all great wits; this is that which hath rarified and enlightened our spirits like the influence of heaven; this is that which hath enfranchised, enlarged, and lifted up our apprehensions degrees above themselves. Ye can not make us now less capable, less knowing, less eagerly pursuing of the truth, unless ye first make yourselves, that made us so, less the lovers, less the founders of our true liberty. We can grow ignorant again, brutish, formal, and slavish, as ye found us; but you then must first become that which ye cannot be, oppressive, arbitrary, and tyrannous, as they were from whom ye have freed us. That our hearts are now more capacious, our thoughts more erected to the search and expectation of greatest and exactest things, is the issue of your own virtue propagated in us; ye cannot suppress that, unless ye reinforce an abrogated and merciless law, that fathers may dispatch at will their own children. And who shall then stick closest to ye and excite others? Not he who takes up arms for coat and conduct (taxation for the clothing and conveyance of troops), and his four nobes of Danegelt. Although I dispraise not the defence of just immunities, yet love my peace better, if that were all. Give me the liberty to know, to utter, and to argue freely according to conscience, above all liberties.

What would be best advised then, if it be found so hurtful and so unequal to suppress opinions for the newness or the unsuitableness to a customary acceptance, will not be my task to say; I shall only repeat what I have learned from one of your own honourable number, a right noble and pious lord, who had he not sacrificed his life and fortunes to the church and commonwealth, we had not now missed and bewailed a worthy and undoubted patron of this argument. Ye know him, I am sure; yet I for honour's sake, and may it be eternal to him, shall name him, the Lord Brook. He writing of episcopacy, and by the way treating of sects and schisms, left ye his vote, or rather now the last words of his dying charge, which I know will ever be of dear and honoured regard with ye, so full of meekness and breathing charity, that next to His last testament, who bequeathed love and peace to his disciples, I cannot call to mind where I have read or heard words more mild and peaceful. He there exhorts us to hear with patience and humility those, however they be miscalled, that desire to live purely in such a use of God's ordinances as the best guidance of their conscience gives them, and to tolerate them, though in some disconformity to ourselves. The book itself will tell us more at large, being published to the world and dedicated to the parliament by him who both for his life and for his death deserves that what advice he left be not laid by without perusal.

And now the time in special is by privilege to write and speak what may help to the further discussing of matters in agitation. The temple of Janus, with his two controversial faces, might now not unsignificantly be set open. And though all the winds of doctrine were let loose to play upon the earth, so Truth be in the field, we do injuriously by licensing and prohibiting to misdoubt her strength. Let her and Falsehood grapple; who ever knew Truth put to the worse in a free and open encounter? Her confuting is the best and surest suppressing. He who hears what praying there is for light and clear knowledge to be sent down among us would think of other matters to be constituted beyond the discipline of Geneva, framed and fabricated already to our hands.

Yet when the new light which we beg for shines in upon us, there be those who envy and oppose, if it come not first in at their casements. What a collusion is this, whenas we are exhorted by the wise men to use diligence, "to seek for wisdom as for hidden treasures," early and late, that another order shall enjoin us to know nothing but by statute? When a man hath been labouring the hardest labour in the deep mines of knowledge, hath furnished out his findings in all their equipage, drawn forth his reasons as it were a battle ranged, scattered and defeated all objections in his way, calls out his adversary into the plain, offers him the advantage of wind and sun, if he please, only that he may try the matter by dint of argument; for his opponents then to skulk, to lay ambushments, to keep a narrow bridge of licensing where the challenger should pass, though it be valour enough in soldiership, is but weakness and cowardice in the wars of truth. For who knows not that truth is strong, next to the Almighty; she needs no policies, nor stratagems, nor licensings to make her victorious; those are the shifts and the defences that error uses against her power; give her but room, and do not bind her when she sleeps, for then she speaks not true, as the old Proteus did, who spoke oracles only when he was caught and bound, but then rather she turns herself into all shapes except her own, and perhaps tunes her voice according to the time, as Micaiah did before Ahab, until she be adjured into her own likeness.

Yet is it not impossible that she may have more shapes than one. What else is all that rank of things indifferent, wherein truth may be on this side or on the other without being unlike herself? What but a vain shadow else is the abolition of "those ordinances, that hand-writing nailed to the cross," what great purchase is this Christian liberty which Paul so often boasts of? His doctrine is that he who eats or eats not, regards a day or regards it not, may do either to the Lord. How many other things might be tolerated in peace and left to conscience, had we but charity, and were it not the chief stronghold of our hypocrisy to be ever judging one another? I fear yet this iron yoke of outward conformity hath left a slavish print upon our necks; the ghost of a linen decency yet haunts us. We stumble, and are impatient at the least dividing of one visible congregation from another, though it be not in fundamentals; and through our forwardness to suppress and our backwardness to recover any enthralled piece of truth out of the gripe of custom we care not to keep truth separated from truth, which is the fiercest rent and disunion of all. We do not see that while we still affect by all means a rigid external formality, we may as soon fall again into a gross conforming stupidity, a stark and dead congealment of "wood and hay and stubble" forced and frozen together, which is more to the sudden degenerating of a church than many subdichotomies of petty schisms.

Not that I can think well of every light separation; or that all in a church is to be expected "gold and silver and precious stones": it is not possible for man to sever the wheat from the tares, the good fish from the other fry; that must be the angels' ministry at the end of mortal things. Yet if all cannot be of one mind, as who looks they should be? this doubtless is more wholesome, more prudent, and more Christian, that many be tolerated rather than all compelled. I mean not tolerated popery and open superstition, which as it extirpates all religions and civil supremacies, so itself should be extirpate, provided first that all charitable and compassionate means be used to win and regain the weak and the misled: that also which is impious or evil absolutely either against faith or manners no law can possibly permit that intends not to unlaw itself: but those neighbouring differences, or rather indifferences, are what I speak of, whether in some point of doctrine or of discipline, which though they may be many, yet need not interrupt the unity of spirit, if we could but find among us the bond of peace.

In the meanwhile, if anyone would write, and bring his helpful hand to the slow-moving reformation which we labor under, if truth have spoken to him before others, or but seemed at least to speak, who hath so bejesuited us that we should trouble that man with asking licence to do so worthy a deed? and not consider this, that if it come to prohibiting, there is not aught more likely to be prohibited than truth itself: whose first appearance to our eyes, bleared and dimmed with prejudice and custom, is more unsightly and unplausible than many errors; even as the person is of many a great man slight and contemptible to see to. And what do they tell us vainly of new opinions, when this very opinion of theirs, that none must be heard but whom they like, is the worst and newest opinion of all others; and is the chief cause why sects and schisms do so much abound, and true knowledge is kept at distance from us? Besides yet a greater danger which is in it: for when God shakes a kingdom with strong and healthful commotions to a general reforming, it is not untrue that many sectaries and false teachers are then busiest in seducing; but yet more true it is that God then raises to his own work men of rare abilities and more than common industry, not only to look back and revive what hath been taught heretofore, but to gain further, and to go on some new enlightened steps in the discovery of truth. For such is the order of God's enlightening his church, to dispense and deal out by degrees his beam, so as our earthly eyes may best sustain it. Neither is God appointed and confined, where and out of which place these his chosen shall be first heard to speak; for he sees not as man sees, chooses not as man chooses, lest we should devote ourselves again to set places and assemblies, and outward callings of men; planting our faith one while in the old convocation house, and another while in the chapel at Westminster; when all the faith and religion that shall be there canonized is not sufficient without plain convincement, and the charity of patient instruction, to supple the least bruise of conscience, to edify the meanest Christian who desires to walk in the spirit, and not in the letter of human trust, for all the number of voices that can be there made; no, though Harry the Seventh himself there, with all his liege tombs about him, should lend them voices from the dead to swell their number.

And if the men be erroneous who appear to be the leading schismatics, what withholds us but our sloth, our self-will, and distrust in the right cause, that we do not give them gentle meetings and gentle dismissions, that we debate not and examine the matter thoroughly with liberal and frequent audience; if not for their sakes yet for our own? Seeing no man who hath tasted learning, but will confess the many ways of profiting by those who, not contented with stale receipts, are able to manage and set forth new positions to the world. And were they but as the dust and cinders of our feet, so long as in that notion they may yet serve to polish and brighten the armoury of truth, even for that respect they were not utterly to be cast away. But if they be of those whom God hath fitted for the special use of these times with eminent and ample gifts, and those perhaps neither among the priests nor among the pharisees, and we, in the haste of a precipitant zeal, shall make no distinction, but resolve to stop their mouths, because we fear they come with new and dangerous opinions, as we commonly forejudge them ere we understand them; no less than woe to us, while, thinking thus to defend the gospel, we are found the persecutors!

There have been not a few since the beginning of this parliament, both of the presbytery and others, who by their unlicensed books to the contempt of an imprimatur first broke that triple ice clung about our hearts, and taught the people to see day; I hope that none of those were the persuaders to renew upon us this bondage which they themselves have wrought so much good by contemning. But if neither the check that Moses gave to young Joshua, nor the countermand which our Saviour gave to young John, who was so ready to prohibit those whom he thought unlicensed, be not enough to admonish our elders how unacceptable to God their testy mood of prohibiting is; if neither their own remembrance what evil hath abounded in the church by this lett of licensing, and what good they themselves have begun by transgressing it, be not enough, but that they will persuade and execute the most Dominican part of the inquisition over us, and are already with one foot in the stirrup so active at suppressing, it would be no unequal distribution in the first place to suppress the suppressors themselves; whom the change of their condition hath puffed up, more than their late experience of harder times hath made wise.

And as for regulating the press, let no man think to have the honour of advising ye better than yourselves have done in that order published next before this, "That no book be printed, unless the printer's and the author's name, or at least the printer's, be registered." Those which otherwise come forth, if they be found mischievous and libelous, the fire and the executioner will be the timeliest and the most effectual remedy that man's prevention can use. For this authentic Spanish policy of licensing books, if I have said aught, will prove the most unlicensed book itself within a short while; and was the immediate image of a star-chamber decree to that purpose made in those times when that court did the rest of those her pious works, for which she is now fallen from the stars with Lucifer. Whereby ye may guess what kind of state prudence, what love of the people, what care of religion or good manners there was at the contriving, although with singular hypocrisy it pretended to bind books to their good behaviour. And how it got the upper hand of your precedent order so well constituted before, if we may believe those men whose profession gives them cause to inquire most, it may be doubted there was in it the fraud of some old patentees and monopolizers in the trade of bookselling; who, under pretence of the poor in their company not to be defrauded, and the just retaining of each man his several copy, (which God forbid should be gainsaid,) brought divers glossing colours to the House, which were indeed but colours, and serving to no end except it be to exercise a superiority over their neighbours; men who do not therefore labour in an honest profession, to which learning is indebted, that they should be made other men's vassals. Another end is thought was aimed at by some of them in procuring by petition this order, that having power in their hands, malignant books might the easier escape abroad, as the event shews. But of these sophisms and elenchs of merchandise I skill not: this I know, that errors in a good government and in a bad are equally almost incident; for what magistrate may not be misinformed, and much the sooner, if liberty of printing be reduced into the power of a few? But to redress willingly and speedily what hath been erred, and in highest authority to esteem a plain advertisement more than others have done a sumptuous bribe, is a virtue, honoured lords and commons, answerable to your highest actions, and whereof none can participate but greatest and wisest men.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I offer a substitute for the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana offers a substitute for the Crosser amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. WOOD of Indiana: Page 60, line 9, after the word "or," strike out the word "anarchistic" and insert the word "seditious."

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, it strikes me that the committee are unfortunate in using the word that they have used. If I am correctly informed we already have a law with reference to prohibiting anarchistic matter going through the mail. If there is not such a law, it should be passed as an independent statute. I think the word "anarchistic" is foreign to the subject matter that we are now considering.

Mr. WEBB. Can the gentleman tell us where we can find the law prohibiting anarchistic matter going through the mails?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I may be mistaken about it.

Mr. WEBB. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. If there is not such a law, there should be. I do not think the word "anarchistic," as it is used here, will accomplish the purpose desired, while the word "seditious" would.

Bouvier has defined sedition. It is the raising of commotions or disturbances in the State. It is a revolt against legitimate authority. As I understand, it is the purpose of this bill, in the first place, to reach those things which are treasonable, and, second, to reach things which are not treasonable but which are for the purpose of disturbing the peace, which are for the purpose of creating commotion in the State. Sedition has been well defined in this country, and it has a fixed place in the law of this country, while "anarchistic" has not. We might have as many different ideas with reference to what constitutes anarchy as there are individuals in this House. As has been referred to by one of the gentlemen in this debate, Tolstoy is recognized as one of the greatest philosophical anarchists that the world has ever produced, but I do not think there is anyone who will say that the teachings of Tolstoy should be excluded from the mails.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will.

Mr. TOWNER. I would like to ask the gentleman if his attention has been called to the definition of anarchist as given in the immigration law, and if he does not think that the same definition, placed in this section as the official statutory definition, would be clear? This is the definition given in the immigration law. Among those who are prohibited from coming to this country are—

> Anarchists, or persons who believe in or advocate the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States, or of all forms of law, or who disbelieve in or are opposed to organized government, or who advocate the assassination of public officials, or who advocate or teach the unlawful destruction of property.

Does not the gentleman think that with that official statutory definition attached to the word "anarchist" it would be what is intended in this statute?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That might be, if the two statutes were to be construed together. But I think this statute should be complete within itself, and I repeat that it is the purpose of this law, if it can be done, to inflict punishment upon those who are guilty of a lesser crime than treason. It is for the purpose of reaching those whose writings, as well as whose deeds, have a tendency to create disturbances in the community, have a tendency to attack and destroy the loyal and patriotic feelings and influences of people throughout the country.

Mr. GORDON. Does not the gentleman think the word "seditious" is a pretty broad and elastic term?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It is a pretty broad and elastic term.

Mr. GORDON. Would you consider the Declaration of Independence a seditious document?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; I do not.

Mr. GORDON. It advocates the destruction of the British Government, and asserts the right of any people to overthrow a government whenever it becomes oppressive.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Had the cause of the colonists failed, no doubt England would have punished the authors of that document for sedition. The reason I am insisting upon the word "seditious" is because of the fact that it has a well-defined meaning. There is no well-defined meaning in the law for the word "anarchistic." There would be no doubt as to what would be inhibited by this section. There would be great confusion until the thing was determined in a court of last resort, if this word undefined is used, and I dare say that with reference to each individual case there would be the question of whether or not that particular thing was or was not anarchy; while anything that has a tendency to disturb the peace of the State or has a tendency to create undue commotion among the people against the interests of the State in time of war has been held to be sedition, and it seems to me that the word "seditious" would accomplish fully the purposes of the measure while the word "anarchistic" does not.

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, as I am opposed to the language of this section as it exists and favor rather the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio. If society is to make any progress at all there certainly must be granted to the members of society the privileges and right of persuading their fellows that the course they are following is wrong and to persuade them to follow another and better course. To say that a man shall not have the right to advocate reforms and changes is based on the assumption that the present existing order of things is absolutely right and correct. One age discovers errors in the preceding age and makes improvements. The history of the world is the history of progress, the casting aside by succeeding generations of the things held most sacred by the preceding one.

So I think men should have the right to advocate those principles which they believe to be for the best interest of society. However, I do not believe that they have a right to bring about changes by violence or force, but through persuasion alone. In other words, I think the right consists in the right to persuade one's fellows and not to coerce one's fellows. So, if that principle be correct, it seems to me it furnishes a criterion by which this legislation ought to be drawn.

The trouble with the bill as introduced, it seems to me, with all due deference and respect to the able gentlemen on the committee, and with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, is that it deals with names and not with definitions of the acts. A name is an empty bucket into which anything can be poured, and having poured it in, you can take it out again. We talk about sedition and anarchy, but before you can enforce the law it is necessary for the administrative officer to define according to his own satisfaction what is meant by sedition and what is meant by anarchy.

I favor the amendment as drawn by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER] because there are defined the acts which are prohibited. If this amendment is adopted to permit the section defining things and naming things which can not be done and which are condemned, we permit men to advocate the things they believe in and exercise their right to persuade the people by appeals to reason and argument.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VENABLE. Yes.

Mr. FESS. In the opinion of the gentleman, does the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio give us what the committee wants to put in the law?

Mr. VENABLE. I do not think so. I do not think it is complete. For instance, "advocating overthrowing the Government by violence." We had a circular read by a gentleman in which it was advocated that soldiers should not enlist and should not fight. I think the man who advocates the doctrine that a soldier should not fight, although the soldier be a passive one, is advocating a thing which is wrong.

Mr. FESS. Is that anarchistic under this term?

Mr. VENABLE. Nobody knows what an administrative officer would bring under that term; it might be anarchistic according to my idea and not according to the ideas of another man. That is the point I am making, that we should not deal with names but ought to define the things which are prohibited.

Mr. LENROOT. Would not the court determine that rather than the administrative officer, and is not sedition as well defined in law as the word treason?

Mr. VENABLE. Hardly so well.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VENABLE. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. In regard to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER], would it not cover all the committee's amendment if it added to it the use of violence for the overthrow of government or the resistance to the Government?

Mr. CROSSER. Or injury to. That is my amendment.

Mr. VENABLE. The gentleman from Wisconsin asked me in regard to sedition and whether or not it was not as well defined as treason. Assuming that your position be correct, that it is as well defined as treason, I do not think that we should deal with names, because we ought to have certain fixed standards by which the postal authorities could apply the test, and not have a long course of legal procedure in the courts as to whether or not the postmaster was justified in his interpretation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I rise to remove from the mind of any Member here the belief that if we adopt this phraseology as it stands the courts will have authority to pass upon the acts of the Postmaster General in construing his action. In the debate the chairman of the committee justified this provision of allowing the word "anarchistic" to remain by saying that there was the palladium of the court still to be had in case it was abused. I challenge that statement. I have before me the decision of the United States Supreme Court in Bates & Guilds Co. v. Payne (194 U. S., p. 106), from which I will read a few excerpts.

In that decision, rendered by Justice Brown, he cites some extracts from former decisions of the Supreme Court, and among others Gaines v. Thompson (7 Wallace, 347), as follows:

It was held that the court could no more interfere by injunction than by mandamus to control the action of the head of a department; and in the United States ex rel. Dunlap v. Black, 128 U. S., 40, it was said that the courts would not interfere by mandamus with executive officers of the Government in the exercise of their ordinary official duties even where those duties require an interpretation of the law, no appellate power being given them for that purpose.

And then he goes on and uses language which is all-controlling of the question of whether or not the courts have any power over the decision of the heads of departments—as where Congress would vest in the Postmaster General the power to determine with his own ipsi dixit what is anarchistic and what may be excluded from the mails.

The rule upon this subject may be summarized as follows: That where the decision of questions of fact is committed by Congress to the judgment and discretion of the head of a department his decision thereon is conclusive; and that even upon mixed questions of law and fact, or of law alone, his decision will carry with it a strong presumption of its correctness, and the courts will not ordinarily review it, although they may have the power and will occasionally exercise the right of so doing.

So I say to the Members of the House that in the stress of war we should not confer upon any executive authority such absolute power that he may exercise it to the detriment of the people in the use of the mails or in the exercise of the privilege of the press. There is no occasion for us now to confer upon the Postmaster General this authority that would enable him to exercise such power. We have never heretofore, in war times or in peace times, conferred such autocratic power upon the Postmaster General. We should not now vest this power in him which can not be reviewed in any way by the courts.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Certainly.

Mr. WEBB. I think my friend has missed the whole meaning of this section. The decision he is reading from is under a case where the Congress already had given the Postmaster General discretionary power, and the courts said they would not intervene by injunction or mandamus to control that discretion, and that is exactly what we struck out in committee. We eliminated the idea of giving the Postmaster General authority to exclude anything from the mails and have made it a question of law and fact left for the court to decide.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is nothing in the amendment which gives the court any power, and here is a decision of Mr. Justice Brown which says the courts will not interfere by mandamus or injunction in that way with the exercise by the head of the department in the construction of the law in the case where Congress gives authority to the executive head to act.

Mr. WEBB. They were interpreting an entirely different statute from the one that is now before us.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Indiana to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The substitute was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 1101. Whoever uses or attempts to use the mails or Postal Service of the United States for the transmission of any matter declared by this title to be nonmailable shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both. Any person violating any provision of this title may be tried and punished either in the district in which the unlawful matter was mailed or to which it was carried by mail for delivery according to the direction thereon, or in which it was caused to be delivered by mail to the person to whom it was addressed.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MASON: Amend by striking out all of section 1101 after the word "both" in line 16.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me before he takes the floor?

Mr. MASON. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I just wanted to ask the gentleman if he knew that this was the exact language of the existing law which forbids lottery-ticket schemes and various things of that kind?

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I know that it has been the practice, and the court has upheld the practice in some cases, but I have made up my mind to make the first effort I could to amend the law so that a man charged with a crime shall be tried in the district where he resides or where the crime was committed. In this particular case, if a man should send out a circular which went to half of the post offices in the country he could be tried under the section in any locality, it makes no difference how far from his home, and the practice that has grown up in the country whereby a man may be charged with a crime against the Government of the United States and be hauled from one end of this country to the other for trial, away from home, away from neighbors, away from opportunity to give bond or bail, is really a great hardship. I feel that by striking this out in this act we can go at least that far. I do not know, however, that it would repeal the existing law in regard to lotteries. I think it would make this law so that a man could be tried and insist upon trial in the district where he is indicted and where the crime is committed.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I hope the amendment will not be adopted. This amendment, as has been pointed out by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], is a verbatim copy of the language with reference to the place of trial as contained in the criminal laws of the country, United States Statutes at Large, chapter 2, section 213, and I do not think it is wise at this time, especially in view of the crimes we are denouncing in this section, to change the law with regard to the place of trial.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. COX. The language in the bill is identical with the language in the so-called Reed bone-dry amendment, adopted at the last session of Congress, is it not?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WEBB. With pleasure.

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether there are any other amendments which gentlemen desire to offer to other sections of the bill or not?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment which I desire to offer to section 13, on page 46.

Mr. MANN. That is section 509?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is there any other amendment?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I have two amendments, one on page 53, section 704, and one on page 57, section 1000.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. RANDALL. To offer an amendment.

Mr. MANN. To what section?

Mr. RANDALL. As an additional title.

Mr. WEBB. Will my friend wait until we perfect this part of the bill?

Mr. RANDALL. I will.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the only amendments desired to be offered are to sections 509, 704, and 1000. I suggest to the gentleman from North Carolina that he ask unanimous consent—how much time is desired for debate?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I do not desire any debate upon one amendment except to state it, and the other one I might possibly wish five minutes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I want five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Would 10 minutes on each of these amendments be sufficient? I suggest to the gentleman from North Carolina that he ask unanimous consent that amendments be offered to sections 509, 704, and 1000 and that debate be limited to 10 minutes on each section and all amendments thereto.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, if that is agreeable to the House—I hope it is—and if we can close up this bill this afternoon I will be gratified.

Mr. MANN. I hope we can, but if we can not we still have to-morrow.

Mr. WEBB. I understand; but I think the House is anxious to get through.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that debate upon all amendments to be offered to be limited to sections 509——

Mr. MANN. Amendments to be offered to sections 509, 704, and 1000 and debate be limited to 10 minutes on each section and all amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that amendments be offered to sections 509, 704, and 1000 and that debate upon said amendments be limited to 10 minutes on each section and all amendments. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to section 509.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows :

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Page 46, strike out all of section 13 under section 509, pages 46 and 47.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, this amendment adds to the existing statute the words in line 21, page 46, "or furnishes the money for or takes part in"; in line 22 adds the words "or naval." The statute as it exists is sufficient to cover any act that may be committed in violation of the actual neutrality of this country. The words "or furnishes money for" are absolutely dangerous and must have been inserted at the request of some foreign government. If this section had existed for the past five years or for the past nine years the Republic of Portugal would never have seen light, and the hopes of the Russian people would not have been realized. Now, under this section any person sending $100 or any sum of money to Ireland to contribute there to the cause is a felon and liable to imprisonment. If a Bohemian sends money home for the purpose of establishing schools to further the cause of their freedom, he commits a crime under this section. And the same is true of the southern Slavs. There are Serbia, Montenegro, Bosnia, Herzegovina, Croatia, Slavonia, and Dalmatia, where they have endeavored for years to unite in a confederation, and they have been kept apart by the intrigues of Hapsburg politics. Now the time is approaching when they can realize their hopes, and if you prevent them from getting together here and collecting funds, so as to assist their brethren across the seas, we will absolutely play right into the hands of the Hapsburgs. Hungary, with the aid of her former oppressed subjects now residing in this country, could declare herself free and independent.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. BORLAND. As I read this section, the word "thence," in line 23, makes it clear that the expedition must proceed from the United States or its possessions.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And the money.

Mr. BORLAND. Not the money, but the expedition.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And the money.

Mr. BORLAND. If I am correct about that——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is my interpretation that the money sent from here violates the statute.

Mr. BORLAND. But the money is to be used in an expedition to be sent from the United States or its possessions to some country with which the United States is at peace.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is true.

Mr. BORLAND. But does not forbid the sending of money from here to some other country.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then the statute covers the situation, if the contention of the gentleman from Missouri is correct, and this language is not necessary. Therefore I urge the gentleman from Missouri to assist me in putting through this amendment.

Mr. WEBB. The chief change is having the words "or naval." Every country in the world has such a statute, and we ought to preserve our neutrality in time of peace. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania: Strike out on page 53 all after the word "peace" in line 14, all of lines 15 and 16, and all preceding the word "and" in line 17, and insert "and if such injury or destruction would constitute a crime punishable by imprisonment under the laws of the United States."

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the lines which I asked the House to strike out read as follows:

and if such injury or destruction would constitute a crime punishable by imprisonment under the laws of the country in which the property is situated.

This section is a section designed to punish a conspiracy to destroy property in a foreign country. Now, that would require the citizen of this country to be familiar with the laws of the foreign country, which is an anomaly in criminal legislation. The words which are sought to be substituted would make it read:

and if such injury or destruction would constitute a crime punishable by imprisonment under the laws of the United States.

And in preserving neutrality no higher standard ought to be asked from us than that the offense defined would be punishable under the laws of the United States if done against property in our own country.

Mr. WEBB. I have no objection to striking out the language the gentleman has indicated, but I do not think it is necessary to add the language he wants to substitute. We put the language he wants stricken out of the bill in the bill for the protection of a man indicted in this country. I have no objection to striking that language out, but I do not think we should insert the language that he proposes.

Mr. MANN. What is the objection to putting that language in?

Mr. WEBB. We make the conspiracy to commit a crime in a foreign country dependent upon whether it is a crime there.

Mr. MANN. We want to punish a conspiracy here to destroy property abroad; but we do not want to punish that conspiracy, as you call it, unless it would be a crime to destroy the same kind of property here.

Mr. WEBB. Suppose it is not a crime to destroy the same kind of property in a foreign country?

Mr. MANN. That does not make any difference.

Mr. WEBB. That is what we want to protect.

Mr. MANN. And you want the man in the United States to know all the criminal laws in the world. It is hard enough to know our own.

Mr. WEBB. We do not want to punish him for committing a crime unless the crime committed against a foreign country is a crime there.

Mr. MANN. A man is supposed to know whether he is going to commit a crime or not. Crimes are not supposed to be accidental, and the man who could not know what the law is ought not to be punished for crime. Now, we theoretically require all men at their own risk to know the laws of the United States, but there is no reason why we should make them know the law of a back Province in China.

Mr. WEBB. If this language is stricken out, then I think it is idle to put in the language suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], because every conspiracy to destroy property in the United States belonging to the United States Government of course is a crime. What is the object of putting it in?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I do not think so. The gentleman is clearly mistaken about it.

Mr. MANN. Then there is no harm in putting it in. It takes the place of what the gentleman had.

Mr. WEBB. I do not think it makes any difference, one way or the other.

Mr. SISSON. If the gentleman will yield, I wish to say that unless you adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, would you not virtually embody in this statute the law of every foreign nation on earth and put us in the attitude of enforcing the laws of every foreign nation on earth, however oppressive they might be?

Mr. WEBB. Certainly not. We provide the punishment. We provide the punishment, depending, however, on whether or not the conspiracy was to commit an offense in a foreign country—something which is an offense there.

Mr. SISSON. That is, you are to enforce a law of a foreign country by means of our instrumentalities here?

Mr. WEBB. No. We do not propose to have any conspiracies hatched in this country to be carried out in a foreign country if it is a crime there. If it is not a crime there, we have nothing to do with it here.

Mr. SISSON. You are attempting to enforce the laws of a foreign country by an instrumentality here?

Mr. WEBB. Oh, no.

Mr. SISSON. And as to every statute which makes it a crime in that way you put it in here to enforce that statute.

Mr. WEBB. No; we forbid a conspiracy in this country to destroy property in a foreign country with which we are at peace if that destruction of property in a foreign country is a crime there. If not, it is not punished here.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. SIEGEL. In United States courts the United States district judges in enforcing the laws only take judicial notice of the laws of our own country. But, according to the way you have it, you would have the ordinary layman know all the laws of all foreign countries.

Mr. WEBB. No; the United States would be required to prove these foreign statutes. For that reason I have no objection to striking it out. It makes it harder to convict. It might affect some of the gentleman's constituents. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIEGEL. I want to say to the gentleman from North Carolina that that State of mine shows a less proportion of crime than any other part of the country. I will put facts in the RECORD to prove it.

Mr. WEBB. Well, I may say there are crimes committed in my own State, so far as that is concerned. I am willing to strike it out if the gentleman wants it stricken out.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FITZGERALD). The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I understand that that carried with it the language?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania: Page 57, line 14, after the word "issued," insert "for the purpose of enforcing the provisions of this act."

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to occupy any time, scarcely, in discussing this. We are familiar with the fact that there is constitutional protection against unlawful searches and seizures. I am opposed to enlarging the search-warrant power to be used by the officials of the Government beyond that which may be covered by the statutes regulating the subject, and these words are put in solely to confine the provisions of title 10 to warrants issued for the purpose of enforcing the provisions of this act. And in passing this bill into a law, we ought to put that restrictive language in the section.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEVENSON. I just ask for information. Is not this the general law of the United States that you are writing in here as to the issuance of search warrants, and if you put that language in here will you not make it impossible to take out a search warrant for any other purpose except for the purpose of enforcing the provisions of this particular act? Will you not destroy the whole right except with respect to this one thing?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman listen for one moment?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; I am asking for information.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I will endeavor to give it, so far as I can. This section does not repeal any existing law, you will notice; the language "except in cases provided for by law." I think it is a very safe rule to adopt in legislating, when you are passing bills which, when they become law, touch upon vital rights, that you shall legislate only upon what is contemplated to be the evil to be redressed by the statute which you are enacting into law; and I simply ask that you say in this law, "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." When we are in this law touching upon the sciatic nerve of personal liberty, we ought not to write into the statute law of the country a statement that there is an unlimited power to issue a search warrant in every case where the agencies of the Government assume to exercise their power.

Mr. STEVENSON. But the gentleman has not answered my question. Is this the only section of the criminal statute which provides for the issuance of a search warrant?

Mr. MANN. This is not a section from the criminal acts.

Mr. STEVENSON. This is a section of the statutes of the United States, is it not?

Mr. MANN. Not at all.

Mr. STEVENSON. I want to ask this question: Where is there a statute of the United States providing for the issuance of warrants except this?

Mr. MANN. There is not; but if there was not any except this there would not be any at all. We are not repealing any statute. We are not amending any statute.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am asking the gentleman from Pennsylvania the question, Is there any power to take out a search warrant on anybody in the United States except for the purpose of enforcing the act which we are passing to-day?

Mr. MANN. The same power would exist that now exists.

Mr. STEVENSON. Where is it?

Mr. MANN. It is in the statutes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I would like the gentleman, if he has addressed the last question to me, to permit me to respond. The subject contained in this bill is the thing about which we are legislating. Whenever you take up the subject generally of issuing search warrants, then I will be ready to meet you and discuss that question intelligently. But when we are legislating on a subject such as contained in this bill, and the search-warrant power is intended to be an ancillary power to enforce this bill, then we are to put in the bill language to the effect that it is ancillary to this bill.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman does not answer the question. He says this is entirely confined to this one proposition; that it applies to nothing else. If that be true, then it is unnecessary to write "for the purpose of enforcing this act" in this bill, because it can not be greater than the act itself. But if it is a statute that should be here for the purpose of taking out search warrants for people who are counterfeiting and all that kind of thing, then they ought to limit it so that no search warrant could be taken out for any other purpose.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of opposing the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM]. There are only a few cases where a search warrant can be issued now under the laws of the United States.

It is an anomaly that while every State in the Union has a law providing for the issuance of search warrants in all cases where such issuance would assist in the detection of crime, yet the United States has no general search-warrant law, but only a law applying to liquor in the Indian country, to supposed unmailable matter, and to a few other special things of that kind. My friend's own State of Pennsylvania has a very full and thorough law, and New York and the rest of the States have laws granting the right to issue search warrants. Why should not the United States have a general law, when it is safeguarded as this provision is carefully written and carefully safeguarded, for the aid of the United States in the detection of crime of whatever character it may be, where a search warrant is necessary to detect that crime?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. WEBB. Just a question.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I wish to know if it is the intention of the committee to make this a general law for the issuance of search warrants in all cases and under all circumstances?

Mr. WEBB. I will say to the gentleman that that is the intention of the committee.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. And not simply for the enforcement of the provisions of this bill?

Mr. WEBB. Absolutely.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Then, I certainly insist upon my amendment, and hope the Members of the House will see to it that no such vicious legislation as that, in violation of constitutional rights, is put upon the statute books.

Mr. WEBB. Does my friend say it violates the Constitution?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. WEBB. If it violates the Constitution, it can not help it any to confine it to the acts covered by this bill, for it would still violate the Constitution. I can not see why the gentleman should advocate a partial provision which is unconstitutional and oppose a complete provision.

Here is what the Attorney General has said on this subject:

Experience has shown that in the enforcement of laws relating to neutral obligations, as well as in the enforcement of the general Federal criminal laws, some provision for the issue of search warrants is imperatively necessary. At present the issue of search warrants is practically authorized only in statutes relative to customs and internal revenue. There are also a few statutes authorizing searches in certain particular cases, such as introduction of liquor into Indian country, presence of unmailable matter, and vessels violating the Alaska fisheries law. In general, however, there is no provision for the issuance of a search warrant in the enforcement of the Federal criminal laws, either to recover stolen Government property or to seize property produced by, or used for, or devoted to a criminal use. It is a legitimate function of a search warrant to gain possession of such property. (State v. McNulty, 73 N. W., 87; Commonwealth v. Dana, 2 Metc., 329; Collin v. Lean, 9 Pac., 173; In re Jackson, 96 U. S., 727; see also 11 Atl., 767; Adams v. United States, 192 U. S., 598; 25 Am. & Eng. Encyl. Law, 2d ed., 146, 147.) The court in the Adams case said: "The right to issue a search warrant to discover stolen property or the means of committing crime is too long established to require discussion."

Such legislation seems now necessary for the detection and efficient punishment of Federal crimes. It seems highly illogical that State officials have power to enforce the criminal laws of the States by the issue of search warrants, while United States officials have no power to enforce the Federal criminal laws in such manner. Effective means of discovering the commission of crime are a protection to the citizens of the United States from crime. Property safeguarded, there is no danger in search warrants. The bill herewith submitted contains careful restrictions on an abuse of the power.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. WEBB. A question; yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. The Attorney General recommended a great many things in connection with this bill that your committee turned down, did he not?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; and my friend seems to be wanting to turn down what the committee did.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Now, I ask you whether a law with reference to the common offenses of society, issuing search warrants in cases of theft and the recovery of stolen property, is a proper basis for a clause that provides for "a full and particular description of the property or papers sought for, and of the place or places where the same are believed to be"? Why are they going to search for papers and documents? In what class of cases?

Mr. WEBB. The gentleman was not present in the committee room when this section was framed, but the subcommittee worked on it, and the full committee worked on it; and we have confined it almost verbatim to the language of the Constitution; and if it does comply with the constitutional provisions, this House ought to be willing to give the Department of Justice power to detect and break up crime of whatever nature against the United States. I can not understand any disposition to the contrary.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. For a question; yes.

Mr. TOWNER. I think the statement was made by the chairman of the committee that this was to be a general statute, applicable in all cases. I will ask the chairman to interpret the language in the third line of the section, in which it says—

A search warrant issued under the provisions of this title.

Would that not limit it to the provisions of this title?

Mr. WEBB. Title X. That is the search-warrant title.

Mr. TOWNER. It means only as contained in this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FITZGERALD). Under the agreement all time has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. WEBB) there were—ayes 71, noes 45.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Before the amendment is offered I wish to direct the attention of the gentleman from North Carolina to line 16, page 59, and to ask him whether the word "orders" is not grammatically incorrect, and if it should not be "order."

Mr. WEBB. I think so.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. VOLSTEAD: Page 58, line 19, strike out all of line 19 after the word "issue" and strike out lines 20 and 21, and insert in lieu thereof "he shall issue it forthwith."

Mr. VOLSTEAD. This only eliminates some language that is entirely unnecessary, and which may tend to confusion. If the judge finds that a search warrant should issue, there can be no necessity of his finding further that it is in due form or that there is probable cause, because the first finding includes the others; the language is superfluous.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Without this language in, will the commissioner have any jurisdiction except to pass on the form of the application?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Certainly; he must determine not only that it is in due form but the real merits of the application.

Mr. MANN. I do not profess to be an expert on criminal law, but I should think that without the language in the law all the commissioner could do would be to pass upon the form of the application. With the language in he must pass upon the question of whether there is probable cause.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It seems to me that he must determine that there is probable cause before he can determine that a warrant should issue.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me that without it he has to take the sworn statement of the applicant, if it is in proper form, and issue the warrant.

Mr. BORLAND. What the gentleman wants to do is to strike out of line 19 the words that such warrant shall issue. And he wants to leave the language that if the commissioner decides that the application is in due form and if there is probable cause he shall forthwith issue the warrant. There is a repetition of language there.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Let me call attention to the fact that in the first part of the section you will find that the judge may summon witnesses and call for additional affidavits. This clearly contemplates that he must consider the merit before the search warrant may issue. A finding that it should issue must involve not only the form but the facts showing grounds for its issue.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman wants to provide that the court or the commissioner shall find two things: First, that the application is in due form; and, second, that there is probable cause. That makes redundant the words in line 19 that the search warrant should issue. Those words are redundant.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I will ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I ask to modify it by striking out, in line 19, the words "that the search warrant should issue."

Mr. WEBB. I have no objection to that amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the modification.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. VOLSTEAD: On page 58, line 19, strike out the words "that the search warrant should issue and."

Mr. WEBB. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Is there any objection to striking out the word "further" in line 20? It is simply surplusage.

Mr. WEBB. I do not think it makes any difference whether it is in or out. Mr. Speaker, I move that, on page 59, line 16, the "s" in the word "orders" be stricken out, so that it will read "order."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 59, line 16, strike out the letter "s" in the word "orders."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 41, line 2, insert a new title as follows: "3a. Destruction of food products. Section 300a. Whoever, when the United States is at war, shall willfully destroy any cereals or vegetables which are valuable for food purposes, either by manufacturing intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes therefrom, or otherwise, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 10 years, or both."

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that is not germane.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman reserve his point of order?

Mr. MEEKER. I will reserve the point of order. No, Mr. Speaker, I will make the point of order. If somebody should step on an apple or throw it into the river I do not think he ought to be fined $10,000.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that any sane man should attempt to make a point of order against any amendment that could be offered to a bill of this kind. This bill embraces a great variety of subjects, such as vessels in ports of the United States, injuring vessels or injuring cargoes of vessels, interference with foreign commerce, enforcement of neutrality, seizure of arms, disturbance of foreign relations, illegal issue of passports, counterfeiting the Government seal, issue of search warrants, use of the mails for circulation of certain matter, publication or communication of certain information, and other subjects. It is the greatest conglomeration of legislative subjects ever presented in a single bill.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield. I agree that every section of this bill is intended to help win this war. I have an amendment designed to help win this war. I submit to the Chair that any amendment which may reasonably help to win this war is in order. Mr. Speaker, a hundred times have I heard upon this floor the assertion that the real patriot of this war is the man who will feed our Army and the man who will feed America. If the man who produces food for the people is a patriot and a hero, then the man who destroys that food is a traitor to his country. The Department of Agriculture——

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentlemen is not discussing the point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I am attempting to show that this amendment is in order upon this bill because it will assist along with the other legislation in the bill in winning this war.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the point of order. He is discussing the sanity of some man who does not agree with him.

Mr. RANDALL. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that I may be heard upon this question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California will address himself to the point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, quoting from a report of the Department of Agriculture covering an investigation made by Dr. Alonzo Taylor, of the University of Pennsylvania, on the relation of the liquor question to the grain supply, the food supply of the country, which I submit is a question that is interesting in this emergency, it shows that in 1916 $145,000,000 of grain and other food materials were consumed in liquor manufacture in the United States.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, I insist that the gentleman is not discussing the point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Upon the objection of any Member to a discussion of the merits of an amendment, the point of order having been made to the amendment, the gentleman must confine himself to a discussion of the point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I shall endeavor to do so. I shall endeavor to confine myself to the subject of the food supply of the country in the present emergency.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will suspend. The question to be determined is whether the particular amendment offered by the gentleman from California is in order as an amendment to this bill, and objection having been made several times the gentleman from California must not discuss further the merits of the amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. All right, Mr. Speaker, then I ask for a ruling, if I am not to be permitted to have any latitude whatever, similar to the latitude other gentlemen in the House have had. I ask for a ruling.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Missouri desire to be heard upon the point of order?

Mr. MEEKER. No.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This bill is entitled "A bill to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States." The amendment proposed by the gentleman from California makes the destruction of food products a crime, either by manufacture of them into intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes or otherwise. The Chair does not thing that it is germane to this bill, and sustains the point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California appeals from the decision of the Chair. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay that appeal on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves that the appeal be laid on the table. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and seventy-nine Members present, not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on the motion to lay on the table the appeal from the decision of the Chair. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 337, nays 20, answered "present" 2, not voting 72, as follows:

Mr. RAINEY with Mr. STRONG.
Mr. SMALL with Mr. VOIGHT.
Mr. WILSON of Texas with Mr. SMITH of Idaho.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, I have a pair with Mr. TALBOTT, of Maryland, and as he would have voted the same as I do on this proposition I desire to let my vote of aye stand.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Speaker, when Mr. LONGWORTH's name was called I answered by mistake and voted aye for Mr. LONGWORTH and I want to correct it.

The name of Mr. OSBORNE was called and he voted "Aye."

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with my colleague, Mr. GANDY. I desire to withdraw my vote of aye and answer "present."

The name of Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota was called and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present; the Doorkeeper will unlock the doors.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill H. R. 291.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] moves the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is: Shall the bill pass?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Sixty gentlemen have risen, not a sufficient number.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the other side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] demands the other side. Those opposed to taking this vote by the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] One hundred and ninety-two gentlemen have risen in the negative. Sixty is a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 260, nays 106, answered "present" 3, not voting 62, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

On the vote:

Mr. BLACK (for) with Mr. MCLEMORE (against).

Until further notice:

Mr. BLANTON with Mr. CLARK of Pennsylvania.
Mr. CAREW with Mr. GEORGE W. FAIRCHILD.
Mr. CLAYPOOL with Mr. FORDNEY.
Mr. FISHER with Mr. FULLER of Illinois.
Mr. FLYNN with Mr. HAWLEY.
Mr. MCCLINTIC with Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH.
Mr. JONES of Virginia with Mr. VOIGT.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I want to make a correction.

The SPEAKER. Is it about this vote?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It is. I do not know what the name was that was called just before Mr. VOLSTEAD's name was called, but whatever it may be I by mistake answered at the time it was called, and that vote should be stricken out.

Mr. STAFFORD. It was Mr. VOIGT, of Wisconsin, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. My own vote should stand, voting "no," but the other man's should be erased.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make the same announcement that I did on the last roll call. I voted "aye," but I have a pair with the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. TALBOTT]. If he had voted, I would vote also. I wish to withdraw my vote and answer "present."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. BROWNING, and he answered "Present."

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, how am I recorded?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not recorded. Was the gentleman in the Hall, listening?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I was, during both roll calls. If I were to vote, I would vote "no," but I am paired with my colleague, Mr. GANDY, and I wish to answer "present."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota, and he answered "Present."

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Idaho] is prevented from being present to-day on account of the critical illness of his son.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. WEBB, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HAWLEY, at the request of Mr. MCARTHUR, for two weeks, on account of the serious illness of his mother in Oregon.

To Mr. HAYES, at the request of Mr. CURRY of California, indefinitely, on account of illness.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague, Hon. ISAAC SIEGEL, be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD on "Patriotism."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that his colleague, Mr. SIEGEL, shall have leave to extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing resolutions adopted by 2,000 Baltimoreans in mass meeting in favor of universal military training.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing the resolutions referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following are the resolutions referred to:

MARYLAND LEAGUE FOR NATIONAL DEFENSE,
Baltimore, Md., May 1, 1917.

Hon. FREDERICK N. ZIHLMAN,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

SIR: The inclosed resolution was adopted by 2,000 Baltimoreans at a mass meeting held last Sunday in the Academy of Music in the interest of universal military training.

We earnestly request your consideration of this petition and of the facts set forth therein.

Respectfully, yours,
GUY HOLLYDAY,
Secretary of the Meeting.

Whereas the administration bill passed by Congress provides that upon the expiration of the present emergency all the military forces of the United States, including the Regular Army, the National Guard, and the additional forces provided for by the act, shall be discharged, leaving this country without any armed forces subject to immediate call by the Government; and

Whereas it is imperative for the security, liberty, and independence of this great Nation that a definite, permanent military policy be adopted, and as the General Staff of the United States Army, the highest military authority, states that one year of military training is necessary to make a soldier, and inasmuch as where there is privilege there is no equality before the law, no liberty, and where there is universal liability to service there can be no privileges: Therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this meeting that it is incumbent upon the Congress of the United States to pass an act providing for the military training of every physically fit youth in the land during times of peace, in order that the security of the country may rest equally and equitably upon its citizens and not upon an unjust, inadequate, and undemocratic volunteer system.

Resolved further, That the establishment of a system of universal obligatory military training and service is the most efficient way to prevent the growth of a military cast whose members will claim that they are entitled to special privileges because of the sacrifice which they make in devoting themselves to military service and the protection of the country, as against those who remain at home and make money.

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request? There was no objection.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW—11 O'CLOCK A. M.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I understand that the British commission is to be in the House to-morrow. At what hour?

The SPEAKER. Twelve-thirty is the word they sent. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

AMENDMENT OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, we had up the other day the Glass bill, to amend the Federal reserve act. We got to the debate under the five-minute rule. As I understand, the gentleman from Virginia is very anxious to proceed to-morrow. If there is no objection, the gentleman from North Carolina might ask that that bill be considered to-morrow.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do ask that, that the bill H. R. 3673 be considered to-morrow, after the reading of the Journal and the transaction of routine business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that to-morrow, after the reading of the Journal and the clearing up of business on the Speaker's table, the bill (H. R. 3673) to amend the Federal reserve act shall be in order. Is there objection?

Mr. LONDON. What does the bill deal with?

The SPEAKER. It is the bill to amend the Federal reserve act. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned, pursuant to the order previously made, until to-morrow, Saturday, May 5, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, May 5, 1917.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, May 2, 1917.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

INTERNATIONAL PARLIAMENTARY CONFERENCE OF COMMERCE (H. DOC. NO. 119).

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of State, which will be inserted in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The communication is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 4, 1917.

The Hon. THOMAS R MARSHALL,
Vice President of the United States.

SIR: I have the honor to advise you for the information of the Senate that I am in receipt of a cable message from the American ambassador at Paris, dated May 2, 1917, stating that he has received an invitation for the Congress of the United States to participate by a delegation in the International Parliamentary Conference of Commerce, which will meet at Rome on May 17, under the presidency of Mr. Tittoni, former ambassador of Italy at Paris.

The ambassador adds that the conference is to be composed of delegates from both chambers of the legislative bodies of the countries represented and of persons prominent in industrial, commercial, and legal circles, and that the object of the conference is to prepare the way for an economic entente after the war, the governments, or the parliaments participating being, however, in no way officially bound by the action of the conference.

I have had the honor to address a similar communication to the Hon. CHAMP CLARK for the information of the House of Representatives.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

ROBERT LANSING.

ESTIMATE OF APPROPRIATION (S. DOC. NO. 17).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Auditor for the War Department submitting an urgent estimate of appropriation for additional force in that department, $136,140, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

INTRACOASTAL WATERWAY (S. DOC. NO. 18).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of February 19, 1917, certain information relative to the measures taken in the State of New Jersey toward carrying into effect a joint resolution adopted by the legislature of that State pledging itself to acquire and donate to the Federal Government the right of way for an intracoastal waterway across the State, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

EXEMPTIONS FROM DRAFT.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a letter from Bishop Chartrand, of Indianapolis, Ind., which will be inserted in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The letter is as follows:

BISHOP'S HOUSE, Indianapolis, May 3, 1917.

To the VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

YOUR EXCELLENCY: You will please pardon me for intruding upon you just now, when I know you are much occupied. In explanation of my telegram, please permit me to call your attention to the following:

1. Catholics, as all the wars of our country testify, have, in the highest as well as the lowest places of the Army and Navy, in vast numbers evidenced their intense loyalty and patriotism.

2. We are only 5 per cent of the population, yet the Navy is Catholic by 40 per cent, and among those who volunteered to go to the border in the recent trouble with Mexico 22 per cent were Catholics. This is certainly a good showing.

3. Priests and nuns are willing to go as chaplains and nurses; they have gone in great numbers, in great numbers in all our wars; they are found always in the very forefront of their country's battles, and many have died heroes to their duty.

4. Priests, however, who make many sacrifices and who have given up everything to devote themselves to the spiritual welfare of the people, should not, in due respect for their sacred calling, be compelled to take up arms.

5. One or two countries in Europe have forced them to do this; but this was in spite of the pleading and protest of the church by certain politicians, out of contempt for the church.

Surely, the great, big, broad American Republic will recognize the calling and work of those who devote themselves, in season and out of season, to the things that are above the clamor and the confusion into which the unfortunate world has been cast.

With cordial greetings to yourself and Mrs. Marshall, I am,

Sincerely, yours,

JOSEPH CHARTRAND, Bishop.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented telegrams in the nature of petitions from the Lumbermen's Exchange of Philadelphia, Pa., and from the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Gildford, Mont., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HARDWICK presented telegrams in the nature of memorials from the Standard Handle Co., Burden, Smith & Co., W. T. Anderson, and Charles B. Lewis, president of the Georgia Bankers' Association, all of Macon, in the State of Georgia, remonstrating against the proposed tax on incomes and profits for 1916, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. THOMPSON presented petitions of sundry citizens of Sterling, Havensville, Emporia, and Winfield, all in the State of Kansas, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the consumption of foodstuffs in the manufacture of intoxicating liquor, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of the Ladies of the Grand Army of the Republic No. 1, of Topeka, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation to protect military camps from vice, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the congregation of the Baptist Church of Hays, Kans., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a petition of the United Baptist Convention of New Hampshire, praying for national prohibition during the period of the war, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented memorials of the Manchester Auto Garage Co., the Hanover Street Garage, and of A. C. Frost, of Manchester, and of the Woodbury Auto Co., of Nashua, all in the State of New Hampshire, remonstrating against a tax of 5 per cent on the wholesale price of automobiles, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented a petition of sundry citizens of Camp County, Tex., praying for the 100 per cent increase in the pay of private soldiers, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented petitions of the Nazarene Church of Hondo; the Pastors' Association of Haskell; of sundry citizens of Crosbyton; of John T. Garner, president of the Farmers' Prohibition League, of Winfield; and of local branch Red Cross Association, of Georgetown, all in the State of Texas, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EIGHT-HOUR LAW (S. DOC. NO. 20).

Mr. SMITH of Arizona, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution (S. Res. 55), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the pamphlet submitted by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] on April 10, 1917, entitled "Opinion of the United States Supreme Court Construing the Act to Establish an Eight-Hour Day for Railway Employees, Together with the Concurring and Dissenting Opinions of the Court," be printed as a Senate document.

UTAH POWER & LIGHT CO. (S. DOC. NO. 21).

Mr. SMITH of Arizona, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution (S. Res. 56), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the pamphlet submitted by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] on April 10, 1917, entitled "Opinion of the United States Supreme Court in the Case of the Utah Power & Light Co. v. The United States, Relating to the Eminent Domain Power of the States," be printed as a Senate document.

ADDRESS BY CLARK W. HETHERINGTON (S. DOC. NO. 22).

Mr. SMITH of Arizona, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution (S. Res. 57), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the manuscript submitted by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] on April 17, 1917, entitled "Shall Military Training Be Given Our Youth?" an address by Clark W. Hetherington, professor of physical education and recreation, University of Wisconsin, be printed as a Senate document.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. HARDWICK:

A bill (S. 2154) to amend an act entitled "An act approved July 17, 1916, to provide for agricultural development, to create standard forms of investment based upon farm mortgages, to equalize rates of interest upon farm loans, to furnish a market for United States bonds, to create Government depositaries and financial agents for the United States, and for other purposes"; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

A bill (S. 2155) to amend an act entitled "An act to repeal section 3480 of the Revised Statutes of the United States"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. PITTMAN:

A bill (S. 2156) to authorize exploration for and disposition of potassium or sodium; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. WATSON:

A bill (S. 2157) granting a pension to Nellie Evans;

A bill (S. 2158) granting an increase of pension to James H. Shutts;

A bill (S. 2159) granting an increase of pension to Henry Wheeler; and

A bill (S. 2160) granting an increase of pension to Nathan Van Metre; to the Committee on Pensions.

PUNISHMENT OF ESPIONAGE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2) to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment of the committee, on page 33.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.
Beckham	Husting	New	Smith, Ga.
Brady	James	Norris	Smoot
Calder	Johnson, Cal.	Overman	Sterling
Chamberlain	Jones, N. Mex.	Page	Sutherland
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Pittman	Thomas
Cummins	Kellogg	Poindexter	Thompson
Curtis	Kendrick	Pomerene	Trammell
Fernald	Kenyon	Reed	Vardaman
Fletcher	King	Robinson	Wadsworth
France	Kirby	Saulsbury	Walsh

Gronna	La Follette	Sheppard	Watson
Hale	McKellar	Sherman	Weeks
Hardwick	Martin	Simmons	Williams

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce the absence of the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] on account of illness in his family.

Mr. JAMES. I desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] on account of illness. I will ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. LANE] on account of illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I have been requested to announce that the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] is absent on official business. He has a general pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE]. I desire that this announcement shall stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PAGE in the chair). Sixty Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. OVERMAN. The next amendment for consideration is in Chapter XI, on page 33.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 33, after line 6, the Committee on the Judiciary report to insert:

SECTION 1. A search warrant may be issued in conformity with the provisions of this act for the purpose of searching any premises or person to discover any property, or papers, held, secured, or used, or intended to be held, secured, or used, in violation of or in aid of a violation of any law of the United States, or of a treaty of the United States, or of the rights or obligations of the United States under the law of nations.

Mr. CUMMINS obtained the floor.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CUMMINS. I will yield to the Senator.

ANTHRACITE COAL SUPPLY (S. DOC. NO. 19).

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Before the discussion begins I should like to ask the Chair to hand down a report which has just been made by the Federal Trade Commission. I do not ask to have it read. I ask to have it printed and also ask that it be published in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. NELSON. What is the report about?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I was going to state that this is a report which I deem of a good deal of importance. Last year I introduced a resolution directing the Federal Trade Commission to investigate the condition in anthracite coal mining by reason of the great advance in the price of coal. The commission went to work. We all know that during the winter there was a large increase in the price of anthracite coal, an increase which was felt all over the country. Recently there have been indications that there would be another increase in the price of anthracite coal. The Federal Trade Commission has made a particular investigation, and has made a report upon that investigation, which is now before the Senate setting forth these facts:

First, that there is no scarcity in anthracite coal; second, that there was no just cause for the unreasonable advance in the price of anthracite coal last winter; third, that there is no just reason now for an advance in the price of anthracite coal; and, fourth, that a large part of the trouble has arisen because of a consumers' panic.

People have become panic-stricken and have sought to fortify themselves and increase the supplies of their coal out of season and unreasonably, and a part of the trouble in the marketing of anthracite coal, as in the marketing of food supplies and in the marketing of print paper, has been due to a foolish and unjustifiable panic on the part of consumers who have sought to gather in unnecessary supplies. The result has been the bidding up of the price. This tendency has been taken advantage of by speculators in food, speculators in coal; and it is the purpose of this report to convince the country that there is no just cause for alarm; that the country will produce this year much more anthracite coal than it has ever produced before, and that if the consumers will be reasonable in their purchases and not seek to lay in six months' supply in advance there is no reason to believe that there will be an undue advance in the price of coal, and there will be no scarcity in the supply of anthracite coal.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator will permit me, I ask him if his inquiry related only to anthracite coal? The Senator knows, of course, that there has been an advance in all kinds of coal. There has been an advance in the price of lignite coal in this country.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. My inquiry, as I remember the resolution last year, related only to anthracite coal, for the reason that anthracite-coal miners were defending the advance in the price of coal by saying that there had been an advance in wages. The report now before the Senate shows the advance in wages only as justifies an advance of 30 cents per ton in the price of coal, which, however, has advanced a great deal more.

Another thing that this report calls attention to is that speculators in coal have held their coal in cars rather than storing it, and in that way have produced a scarcity of freight cars in this country, which the commission suggests is an evil that Congress ought to deal with—the using of cars upon the railroads as warehouses in which coal has been stored while speculators have endeavored to get the advantage in the artificial advance in the price of coal.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am calling this to the attention of the Senate and the country at this time in the hope that the press associations and the newspapers will spread broadcast the authoritative statement of the Federal Trade Commission in this report that there is no scarcity in the supply of anthracite coal and no justification for an advance in the price.

Furthermore, it is stated in this report that the Federal Trade Commission have had repeated conferences with those who produce anthracite coal and have assurances from them that they will cooperate in preventing dealers and speculators from robbing the public by an unconscionable advance in the price of coal.

Mr. President, I think this is a matter of a good deal of importance, and we can not have too much publicity of it, because, as I say, it not only is true with regard to coal, but with regard to a great many other necessaries of life. This country has been getting into a hysterical condition as to supplies, and hundreds of thousands of householders have been going to market and supplying themselves with the necessaries of life months in advance of any need to use them. In that way they have contributed to produce this apparent scarcity and, I believe, have contributed to put up prices. I think it is time we started a propaganda to the contrary. This great country, with its enormous productive energies, is able to supply the people with all that is needed; and it is only this panic of consumers, cooperated in also by the speculators, which is making a very serious unnecessary increase in the cost of living.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I think there is very great truth in the statement just made by the Senator from Nebraska, but there is another element at work which has had more to do with the increase of prices than even those causes which the Senator has suggested. That is the difficulty of distributing the coal. To illustrate: Last summer, while I was in the coal regions of Ohio, I found that in many banks their books were filled with orders and the miners eager to work. In one locality particularly I was advised that the books were filled with orders, but the miners could only get work one day per week, because the employers could not get the cars necessary for distribution. This is true with regard to food products as well.

A significant fact was disclosed just the day before yesterday in the hearings before a subcommittee of the Interstate Commerce Committee on a bill giving further power to the Interstate Commerce Commisssion in the regulation of the distribution of cars. The public utilities commissioner of the State of Minnesota testified that at the present time there were 25,000,000 bushels of wheat which had been sold and ready for delivery in the State of Minnesota alone, 5,000,000 bushels to go to the allies and 20,000,000 bushels to go to the American millers, but that there was not a car in sight with which to deliver this vast quantity of grain. This means that in one State alone there was more than 1 bushel of wheat for every family in the United States sold and ready to be delivered and no means for delivery. Of course such a condition seriously disturbs normal market prices.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I trust the Senator from Ohio will not confuse the issues. I realize that there is force in what he says; but the thing to get before this country now in concrete form—and I hope the newspapers and press associations will cooperate in doing so—is that we have here an authoritative statement of a Government agency that has carefully investigated the situation, and that they have found there is an abundant supply of anthracite coal for all needs and no warrant for an advance in the price. If that fact can once be thoroughly understood by the country, it will do much to allay this uneasiness and to put a stop to this difficulty.

I want to say that I know of a case in which a large manufacturer went to a Government official in this city a few days ago in an alarmed condition, saying that he was anxious about his supply of coke, and that he wanted at once 500 cars of coke. Careful inquiry was made into his affairs, and it was found that he had at present four months' supply of coke on hand; in other words, he was in a panic, and he was making the case worse by endeavoring to gather in a large part of the supply that he might need during the next year.

For that reason, Mr. President, I think that an authoritative statement such as this by a Government agency which has investigated the situation and has reported to the country that there is no scarcity of anthracite coal, that the production this year will be far larger than it has ever before been, and that there is no justification for an advance in the price of that coal, but that there is every reason why those who purchase during the summer in reasonable quantities should have the usual summer discount—I think it is important that that fact should get before the country thoroughly, in order that the people may know that there is no cause for uneasiness on this subject, and that will do much to put an end to this panicky condition in this necessary of life. I believe, if it can also be applied to other necessaries of life, it will do very much in alleviating this artificial condition, which has come about through a consumers' panic and through speculators' machinations.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me on that very point, I wish to say that he certainly is doing a great service in calling attention to that report on the anthracite-coal situation. This very morning I ascertained from officials connected with a hospital in which I feel a very great interest in the city of Washington that last year under contract they procured their coal at, I think, $3.50 a ton, and that under a new contract, which they are required to make, unless they purchase coal by the load, as they are doing now, it is going to cost them $7.90 a ton; I think that is the figure, but it is certainly over $7.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There is no justification for that. I will say that I think this report shows conclusively that the country has been robbed by speculators, and that the consumers themselves have contributed to it by getting into a panicky condition. I believe that Congress ought to do something to put a stop to the storing of the necessaries of life in freight cars, the using of freight cars, which ought to be used in transportation, to store goods for purposes of speculation. I think some of these emergency bills which we have before Congress ought to be enlarged so as to put an end to that evil, if possible.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. Does not the Senator think that this panicky condition among the consumers is largely justified by the fact that the actual necessities of life, such as coal, are costing many families in this country far more than the combined incomes of all their members, and that therefore it is not only justified, but inseparable from existing conditions?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I think that undoubtedly we have got to share with the rest of the world in the advance in the prices of all things that we buy.

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But I believe that we have unnecessarily contributed to it, first, by permitting speculation.

Mr. THOMAS. I agree with that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Take what I have stated as to cost as an instance, where people have bought far in advance of their needs. There can be no excuse for a manufacturer who has four months' supply of coke on hand coming to a Government agency here in Washington and urging as a favor that he be permitted to buy additional coke, and yet that is what he is doing on a large scale, and what is also being done by millions of consumers on a small scale all over the country.

But the point I am making is that this authoritative statement ought to be taken by the country, first, to prove that there is no scarcity of anthracite coal, and, second, that the people who are worrying about it and laying up their supplies in advance are contributing to higher prices.

Mr. THOMAS and Mr. CALDER addressed the Chair.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I yielded for the purpose of hearing the report, and I am becoming impatient to hear it read.

Mr. THOMAS. I will not trespass on the Senator.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator consent to have the report read?

Mr. CUMMINS. I want to have it read.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask that the report be read, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION,
Washington, May 4, 1917.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

SIR: By direction of the United States Senate, as expressed in resolution No. 217, Sixty-fourth Congress (Senator HITCHCOCK), the Federal Trade Commission has been engaged in an investigation of certain phases of the anthracite-coal industry.

While that investigation was going forward a "buying panic" developed in the autumn of 1916 and enormous increases in retail prices resulted. Continuing its general investigation, the Federal Trade Commission turned immediate attention to this condition. The commission, being about to make its report, finds that at this present moment the symptoms of the former unwarranted panic are recurring and that there is now imminent a repetition of the conditions obtaining last winter.

These conditions were intolerable, and the commission now, therefore, without waiting the transmission of its complete report on past conditions, is moved to call to the attention of the Senate the danger threatening the consumers of anthracite coal and the steps thus far taken based upon the knowledge of the commission and within the limitations of its power to avert that situation.

During the past week daily conferences have been held with anthracite operators, with the officials of the United Mine Workers of America, with leading jobbers, and with retailers from various parts of the country.

The commission is able to say that there now exists no good reason for a panic in the anthracite market nor for any increase in the present selling price to consumers. On the contrary, the retail prices generally obtaining to-day are unwarranted.

The wage increase agreed upon on April 26, 1917, will involve an increased cost of production of between 24 and 30 cents a ton. The price at which leading operators have announced that they will sell will not exceed this increase. This price is upon anthracite on cars at the mouth of the mine. There is no justification for a larger increase to be passed on to the consumer, and these mine prices will not justify present retail prices in many instances.

The new wage scale with the United Mine Workers is a beneficial and steadying factor in the industry. The commission has received assurances both from responsible anthracite operators and from the miners' representatives that this will be a year of unusually large production. The mine prices announced for May reflect approximately the wage increase of last week. The commission is assured that there is no reason why this price should not continue for the season and be subject to the usual summer discounts, namely, 40 cents per ton in May, 30 cents in June, 20 cents in July, and 10 cents in August.

The commission believes that the custom normally followed by the majority of retailers of passing the benefit of these discounts on to the consumer should be followed by the whole trade.

If the public is again so deceived as to indulge in a scramble for coal such as occurred last winter, the favorable situation above reported may be nullified. A demand for four months' coal in the single month of May will be most deplorable. If, on the other hand, purchases are made as usual, there will be no disturbance and small chance for speculators to fleece the public. The best thing that can happen now is for everyone to buy as has been his custom in former years. Such normal buying spreads evenly through the summer, and will insure a steady flow of the production of the mines through the channels of distribution, to build up usual supplies in the hands of consumers, and more especially to build up the normal stock piles of wholesalers and retailers at points far removed from the anthracite region. Many of these points must build up their winter supply during the summer when water transportation is available. Transportation will thereby be relieved of undue burdens and the coal will be steadily distributed during the summer against the needs of the winter.

During the coal panic of the winter of 1916–17, one of the greatest factors in the distressing and intolerable condition was the unwarranted and indefensible practice of using coal cars for warehouses. Coal was held in cars by speculators while shortage of cars was alleged as a cause of fuel shortage. The commission calls your attention also to other activities of speculators in anthracite coal who perform no useful service in the distribution of the coal, but who insert themselves as a disturbing and clogging factor upon the industry and whose unearned profits are often much greater than those enjoyed by either miner or operator or honest dealer. These profits, in many instances more than 100 per cent, were paid by the consumer, together with enormous bills for car demurrage.

Within the scope of its powers this commission will continue to exert every influence to avert the threatened recurrence of the conditions obtaining in the winter of 1916–17. To this end the commission proposes to secure complete current information, keeping close to the conditions of production, distribution, price at the mouth of the mine, price to jobbers, price to retailers, and price paid by the public.

The commission will expose any unscrupulous wholesaler, jobber, or retailer who seeks to mislead the public into a belief that exorbitant prices are justifiable or that there is any necessity to join in a frenzied bidding to secure immediate delivery for far-future needs.

The commission will compile this information at frequent intervals and will ask the cooperation of the patriotic newspapers of the country to the end that the public may be kept constantly informed of what, in justice and reason, it should be expected to pay for anthracite coal and as to the volume of the production and stocks on hand existing at such times. The commission has assurances from the anthracite operators that in case of local shortages being called to their attention by the commission the operators will relieve such local stringency immediately.

The agencies which handle and distribute coal after it leaves the mine and before it comes into the hands of the consumer have also been heard to say to the commission, through numerous representatives, that they desire and will expect only a fair and reasonable profit for the useful labor and service which they perform.

The fair retail price at any place is the price at the mouth of the mine, plus freight, plus the reasonable dealer's profit and cost of local delivery. The May price at the mine of ordinary white-ash anthracite, allowing for the 40 cent discount, is approximately as follows:

	Gross ton (2,240 pounds).	Net ton (2,000 pounds).
Egg	$4.05	$3.61
Stove	4.30	3.84
Chestnut	4.40	3.93

So, then, anthracite-coal consumers of the United States may feel assured, first, that there is an adequate supply of coal; second, that that supply will be taken out and prepared for use in a large and constant flow during the summer months; third, that in so far as the power of constant scrutiny and publicity are effective, the Federal Trade Commission will function; fourth, that prices at the mine will be reasonable and such as would not justify the average prices now being paid by consumers.

As to the price of coal to the consumer for the coming season, this leaves two problems for further action, either by the Congress of the United States or by some authority to be designated by Congress: First, the elimination of the element of speculation and the charging of an exorbitant price or the withholding from use of this necessity of life; and, second, the imperative need of keeping the coal moving from the point of its production to its final destination and of preventing coal cars from being held out of use for the purpose of speculative storage.

The Federal Trade Commission will have the honor to present to you at an early time a further and detailed report and recommendation upon the anthracite-coal industry.

Respectfully submitted.

JOSEPH E. DAVIES,
WILLIAM B. COLVER,
JOHN F. FORT,
Commissioners.

(Chairman William J. Harris did not sign, being in Chicago, engaged in a hearing on bituminous coal.)

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, what the commission has said of the anthracite coal situation is equally true of those sections of the country which depend upon bituminous and lignite coal for their supply. It is a nation-wide condition. While it is doubtless true that the anxiety of consumers has contributed to the acuteness of this situation, it is equally true that their apprehensions and their desire to safeguard the future are not only rational, but are the inevitable consequence of this constant rise, this unnatural rise, in the prices of all necessities of life, a rise which can not be explained in its present extreme by any other cause than by the cornering by speculators of the necessaries of life and by the gamblers of the produce exchanges, including as well food, clothing, and coal. This apprehension will continue so long as these prices prevail; it will grow with every increase; the feeling will grow in volume as the danger becomes more menacing.

From the voluminous communications which I have received upon this subject in the last two or three days from all sorts and conditions of men expressing warm approval of some remarks of mine in this Chamber early in the week I am inclined to think that we are rapidly approaching the breaking point. I hope not. I pray not, Mr. President. For there is no revolt so terrible as that which comes from lack of food, lack of clothing, lack of coal to warm the habitation. Nothing more justifies to every thinking man those extremities of lawlessness which are provoked by the lack of appropriate remedy or the enforcement of existing legislation to prevent these conditions and punish those responsible for them. The Anglo-Saxon is long-suffering, but do not push him over the precipice. Anne of Austria years ago said to Cardinal Mazarini, "My Lord Cardinal, the Almighty always pays. He does not pay every week or every month or every year, but He always pays some time." I commend that profound truth to the immediate consideration of those who are cornering or speculating in the necessaries of life, who make long prayers and devour widows' houses. The people must have food, clothing, and coal at decent prices or they will know why.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I believe that the report ought to be published as a public document and circulated. I believe that it has a great deal of merit in it; but there is one other thing which, I think, also contributes to the high price of coal.

About 15 years ago the Government undertook a policy of withdrawing from entry coal lands upon the public domain; and although the Geological Survey stated that there were in the State of Wyoming, in public lands, 449,000,000,000 tons of coal, enough to supply the world for 400 years, and that there were 371,000,000,000 tons of coal in the public lands of Colorado, enough to supply the world for 300 years, yet, notwithstanding that, a policy was then adopted which was to the effect that these lands should be withdrawn from entry until classified.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I hate to interrupt the Senator's remarks by calling for the regular order, but I can not——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I shall be through in only a minute more. Following that there was a reclassification of these lands by the Government by which a very high valuation was placed upon the same, reaching as high as $400 and $500 an acre; and the result has been that practically no lands have since been taken up under the coal-mining laws of the United States. That has been one of the reasons, Mr. President, in my judgment, that has caused this great shortage of coal. The policy aids in the establishment of a monopoly of those companies that own their coal lands.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, the other day I introduced a resolution, which was adopted by the Senate, dealing with this very subject. I introduced it because of the protests of many people from all over the country and State, especially the city of New York. I am very glad that we have had so complete a report on the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and trust it will be given the fullest publicity. I believe that in a measure the high price of coal is due to the unnecessary excitement of the people at this time, but I do insist also that it is caused in part by speculation.

It has been the practice of the coal dealers in the larger cities of the East, and I assume all over the country, to begin the solicitation of orders for coal in the early spring. In the month of April they offer a reduction of 50 cents a ton, and, as the report indicates, for May 40 cents, for June 30 cents, for July 20 cents, and for August 10 cents a ton.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I hate to interrupt the Senator, but——

Mr. CALDER. I will conclude in two or three minutes. During the month of April of this year dealers all over New York began the usual process of soliciting orders. I know many householders who have given orders for coal expecting, as has been the custom heretofore, to obtain immediate delivery, only to be informed that while the orders were taken there could be no assurance when the coal could be delivered. So that the dealers themselves are more responsible for this panicky situation regarding coal than are the people.

I do hope that this report will be given the widest publicity. I believe it will in a measure allay this panicky feeling; but I also insist, Mr. President, that the Federal Trade Commission or some other function of the Government is duty bound to see to it that no combination of interests either between operators, speculators, or dealers in coal is permitted to exist, to the end that the people during the coming fall and winter may not be required to pay exorbitant prices for this product.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I modify my request so as to ask that this be printed as a public document and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and that 5,000 extra copies be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

CONSTRUCTION OF SHIPS.

Mr. KNOX. I ask unanimous consent that I may send to the desk and have read a resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection the resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 58), as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish the Senate with information as to the number of ships now in process of construction in American shipyards, or that are completed and undelivered, under contracts with all persons, corporations, or governments other than the Government of the United States.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of this resolution, for this reason:

I have been informed, from sources that I entirely credit, that there are a great number of commercial vessels in process of construction, many of which have been practically completed and are ready for delivery to private corporations and persons residing in the United States and private corporations and persons residing in foreign countries. I notice by the press within the last 10 days that complete crews to man some 40 commercial vessels for citizens and corporations of foreign Governments have recently arrived in this country for the purpose of receiving delivery of and taking away these vessels.

Now, of course, everybody knows that such vessels are subject to requisition; and while I am not urging any action in that direction at this time, I think it is well that such information as this resolution calls for should be received by the Senate, and therefore I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question. Does the Senator have any doubt about the advisability of making public information like that?

Mr. KNOX. I have excluded vessels building for the United States. I have thought of that, and I can see no objection to its being made public, as to the vessels that are being constructed for commercial purposes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It just occurred to me, in view of the intensity of this submarine warfare, that information as to the number of merchant ships that we have under construction and that the enemy would have to meet would be very valuable information to the enemy. I simply suggest that to the Senator.

Mr. KNOX. I think perhaps it would be very valuable information for us, because I am informed that there are a very large number of these vessels which could be utilized by the United States for the purpose of carrying food and other products to Europe.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wonder if that information could be brought to the Senate in such a way as to have it treated as confidential or secret, so that it should not become public information. It occurs to me that it might be valuable to the enemy.

Mr. KNOX. I will modify the resolution by inserting the words "if not incompatible with the public interest," and let the executive department of the Government determine that question.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I will suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania that this information has probably been already furnished by the Shipping Board to the Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. KNOX. Is not the Shipping Board operating under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce?

Mr. HARDING. I have no knowledge of that fact.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; it is an independent organization.

Mr. KNOX. I accept the suggestion, and will ask to have the words "the United States Shipping Board" inserted in the place of the words "the Secretary of Commerce."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 291) to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PUNISHMENT OF ESPIONAGE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2) to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is the amendment on page 33.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, in submitting some observations in opposition to the chapter of the heterogeneous and conglomerate measure now under consideration I am appealing to the same calmness of judgment in legislation which the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] so earnestly invoked in presenting the resolution which has just been read. There is quite as much danger of undue excitement and hasty action in legislation as there is in the conduct of the people in carrying on the business in which they are interested. What has been said inclines me to refer to certain aspects of the existing situation before attempting an analysis of this chapter of the bill.

Under cover of the war the great industries of the United States are willfully disregarding and intentionally violating the antitrust laws of the country and are sweeping into their coffers every day profits which baffle the imagination when one attempts to measure them in the medium to which we are accustomed. I have sometimes thought—especially in view of what has occurred this morning—that if the departments of the Government were as vigilant and energetic in enforcing the laws we have as they are in writing new ones, many of the evils of which we complain, and justly complain, could before this time have found a remedy. Taking advantage of the general confusion which is observable everywhere, the railway companies of the country are about to advance their rates to a point which will yield them a gross annual revenue of nearly, if not quite, $400,000,000 in excess of their present unparalleled income. I can not especially condemn the officers of the railways of the country, for I assume that from their point of view these additional revenues are required; but in the smoke which surrounds all our undertakings just now we seem to be indifferent with regard to these movements which must ultimately work disaster to the people of the country.

Impressed, apparently, with the pervading and prevailing spirit, the executive departments are making unprecedented inroads upon the liberties and privileges of the people—liberties and privileges which I have no doubt these departments believe should be subordinated for the time, but which I think are essential to the preservation of free institutions. I think they are too active in these respects. I am not criticizing the communication, under proper circumstances, between the departments and Congress. I am not criticizing the preparation of bills by some department of the Government and submitting them to the committees of Congress; but I think they, too, have become hysterical. They are apparently filled with fear of imaginary evils, and they prepare and present to us a series of enactments the like of which never before found their way into the legislation of any country in the world.

I am quite willing to believe that these departments of the Government are honest in their efforts to suppress what they believe to be dangers and perils confronting us. I am not in the habit of imputing bad motives to anybody unless I have conclusive evidence that these motives do exist. But I venture at this moment to offer a word of counsel and advice, and I hope it will be received with sober thought. This Government is at the present moment confronted with difficulties which never before were presented to our organized society. Its first duty is, and everybody ought to admit it, to raise and equip an army sufficient for our defense. It is a vast work. The preparation of everything that goes to make up an efficient army of the magnitude required by our necessities is so burdensome upon the mind as well as upon the body that it can not be wondered if we are slow and somewhat ineffectual in the beginning; but we ought to give our whole thought to that mighty work. It will be a good while before we have the men who are required in camp and it will be a good deal longer before we have the equipment which they must have in order to become efficient defenders of the country.

Second, we ought to concentrate all our activities and energies upon sweeping the submarine from the sea. There is room in this undertaking for all the genius and all the resources of the American Republic. It is a present menace, it is a constant peril which is before us, and we must deal with it, and deal with it successfully if this war is brought to a victorious end.

I think we ought to go a little slowly in taking over the industrial activities of the United States. These activities are greater than are found in any other country in the world. They are more varied, they are more difficult of management and direction than the activities of any other country in the world.

While I believe in establishing certain rules of honesty and efficiency which we will compel others to obey I am slow to see the Government enter the fields and the factories of the United States and attempt to do directly through its own agencies things that are now being done by the best brain, the most effective genius, that the world of industry has ever evolved.

I think with regard to coal, of which we have heard this morning, we do not need to take possession of the coal mines. We have a law now in force to prevent the very situation so eloquently and impressively depicted by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. The men who do these things, which are, of course, forbidden not only by the law of God but by the law of men as well, ought to be put into the penitentiary, and we have a law which in my judgment if vigorously enforced would accomplish that purpose.

It may be that we ought to enact some further legislation with regard to the effort to extort unreasonable profits in the transaction of business. If we had a statute, however, which made it criminal for any man to demand or to receive more than a fair and reasonable profit in the transactions in which he engages, and if that law were enforced with fair diligence, the extortions of which the country has been full in the last year or two would not be repeated.

What we ought to do with regard to the business of the country is to declare the principles upon which it shall be conducted and allow the men who are accustomed to do the business to continue to do it. If they offend against the law, then punish them as they deserve to be punished; but I fear——

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. CUMMINS. But I fear the entrance by the Government upon the management of all the industries of the Nation. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. I am very largely in sympathy with what the Senator from Iowa has been saying, but it is a difficult problem to determine what is extortion, whether it covers a term of years or one year. I wish to ask the Senator this hypothetical question: Suppose the owner of a coal mine had been operating it for 10 years and from the product of it he had not made any money, but the prices under present conditions were such that he would make 25 or 30 per cent on his investment, would the Senator consider that to be extortion?

Mr. CUMMINS. I would not. But the incident, of course, to which the Senator refers never could arise.

Mr. WEEKS. It has arisen.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; it has not arisen, and it can not arise; and I will tell the Senator from Massachusetts why.

Somebody has been making a profit on coal for the last 10 years, and if the company which has been making the profit should be confined to a fair profit there is no danger that the company which has been doing business without a profit could sell its output at more than the price fixed by its competitors. So while I answer the question very frankly, I am quite sure that there are no instances, or very few, at least, in which any seller could justify a profit of 25 or 30 per cent.

Mr. WEEKS. If the Senator has time ever to investigate the question and does investigate it he will find there are a very large number of such instances in the soft coal trade. I am not speaking of anthracite coal.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not investigated the particular instances. If in the instance referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts he should sell his coal in competition with others at a profit of 25 or 30 per cent to make up the losses of the past 10 years, I do not regard that as morally wrong.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. The surprising thing about all these reports is that they do not give information on the vital points. I should like to know how much it costs to put a ton of coal on board a car, how much the railroads get for carrying it, and what the retailers get. I have never yet been able to ascertain that. There is nothing in this report about it. I have a suspicion that the retailers get a bigger profit than either the miners or the railroads; but we have no data on it.

Mr. WEEKS. In the last 10 years, practically speaking, it has cost more to transport a ton of coal from the West Virginia coal mines to the seaboard than the gross price averaged to the miner.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no doubt of that, Mr. President. I do not undertake to say what the proper rate on coal is for any given distance. There has been an increase in the cost of producing coal at the mines, for I assume that the compensation of miners has increased in harmony with the general advance of wages. But in our country soft coal reaches the car in which it is to be transported at a cost not to exceed $1.15 a ton, possibly $1.25 a ton in some particular locality, and all the rest of the ultimate charge is the cost of transportation and the profit to the middle men.

But I did not intend to enter, Mr. President, into a discussion of the profits which are enjoyed by the various enterprises of the country. I only say that it is my judgment that instead of the Government attempting to manage for itself and to dispossess those who are now in control and undertake the direction of these great enterprises the Government ought to be content in imposing certain rules of honesty and morality and decency upon those who own and conduct the property and depend for the outcome upon the enforcement of those rules.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. SHERMAN. While the Senator is on that branch of the discussion, what would he think the Government could do on patented articles in which the inventor has the exclusive right, and to which he devoted, say, 20 or 25 years before he had perfected his invention and had it put on the market?

Mr. CUMMINS. It is a very difficult thing to control, but fortunately there are not many of the necessities of life controlled by a patent.

Mr. SHERMAN. How about the telephone?

Mr. CUMMINS. There are no patents on telephones, they have all expired; that is, all the essential patents expired years ago.

Mr. SHERMAN. There was a time within the lifetime of the patent when the inquiry would apply.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is very pertinent.

Mr. SHERMAN. When the only telephone practically in our offices was covered by the original patent.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am speaking, of course, Mr. President, of the great necessities of life, the scarcity of which we deplore, and the prices of which are in many cases beyond the reach of the common, ordinary citizen.

I beg pardon for this diversion. I come now to the chapter which is before us.

Mr. President, the words "search and seizure" have an ominous sound in the ears of American freemen. I am but mentioning familiar history when I say that the Revolution began in 1761 with the immortal attack made by James Otis upon the writs of assistance with which England was harrowing the patriots of Massachusetts. I but remind you of a mountain peak in history when I say that the abuse of the search warrant or seizure or writ of assistance furnished Thomas Jefferson the most terriffic indictment found in the Declaration of Indepedence, and it ultimately became the basis of the fourth amendment to the Constitution.

In view of these facts—and they are very important and I think ought to be interesting facts—is it any wonder that the people of this time should consider with very great care a proposal to extend the operation of the search warrant far beyond the limits ever defined by any country in the world. I am now speaking, of course, of times of peace, and I am also speaking of free countries. I do not know what Russia did with her search warrants; I do not know what Germany has done with search warrants; I do not know what Great Britain has done in the last few months with search warrants; but I know what Great Britain did with search warrants in the days from which we draw our inspiration. I know the lesson she taught in the time when she was holding up for the whole world an example of liberty.

For 128 years the United States has passed along her way among the nations of the earth without any legislation of this character, and her history has not only been a source of gratification to every lover of freedom, to every lover of individual privilege and immunity from espionage and from the interference of Government, but it has been a history of which every citizen of the land is so proud that he is willing to fight for the democracy established by our forefathers. The question is whether we are willing to surrender it on the floor of the Senate.

I am going now to read the first section of this chapter. First, let me say, however, that we have this process in the laws of the United States. We have authorized search warrants to seize smuggled goods that were sought to be imported into this country without the observance of the customs laws. We have a search-warrant law respecting the seizure of counterfeiting tools and of property that is used for the violation of the law in that respect. We have a search-warrant law relating to some phases of the liquor traffic, especially with the Indians, I believe, and there are two or three other instances of that kind. Those are all the search-warrant laws which we have at the present moment. We have lived for 128 years in prosperity and in safety and in progress without giving to the Government the right upon mere suspicion to search not only the premises but the persons of all our people for property and papers relating to the subjects I am about now to mention.

Section 1 is as follows:

SECTION 1. A search warrant may be issued in conformity with the provisions of this act for the purpose of searching any premises or person to discover any property, or papers, held, secured, or used, or intended to be held, secured, or used, in violation of or in aid of a violation of any law of the United States—

So far I have quoted from the section. I now add, any law of the United States, whether civil or criminal; any law of the United States, whether it attaches simply the remedy of damages for a wrongful act, or whether it attaches a penalty in the form of a forfeiture, a fine, or imprisonment. I am not prepared to say that there is no parallel for a provision of this sort in the law of any State in the Union; I only say that I am not familiar with a statute of that kind anywhere, and I know that among the great nations of the earth with free institutions there never has been a law of that character.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am greatly interested in what the Senator is saying, and I desire to ask would not that power, if put in the form of law, enable a United States marshal to search a man's business office?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. And he could take private papers, involving titles to property or securities of any kind that are current on the market, such as stocks, bonds, and mortgages?

Mr. CUMMINS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is there any remedy against the invasion of private business under such a provision?

Mr. CUMMINS. There is none whatever, except, after there is a hearing, such papers may be returned.

Mr. SHERMAN. But they may be impounded indefinitely pending the hearing?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly. There is, however, this limitation—I do not want to be misunderstood—it must be alleged before the judge or the commissioner—and any United States commissioner can issue this warrant under the terms of the proposed statute——

Mr. SHERMAN. I am assuming that the formalities required by the provisions of the bill shall have been complied with and a search warrant issued in the usual form, but enlarging the ordinary search warrant that now may be taken out for searching to recover stolen property with the well-known limitations that are on search warrants——

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. But under the enlargement in the bill would there be any limitation on it?

Mr. CUMMINS. There would be none. Every lawyer knows that ordinarily, no matter what may be the terms of the statutes of the various States, the search warrant has, in the main, been used for the purpose of discovering and reclaiming stolen property. It has been extended to the execution of certain other laws, notably to the liquor laws of the States, but it has been recognized everywhere as the efficient and the proper remedy for uncovering and reclaiming stolen property.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from Iowa, of course, knows that under the English common law and the statutes of all of our States the service of a search warrant is expressly limited to the daytime, and for the most obvious reasons, which are essential to the protection of the individual. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that, in addition to the criticisms which he has made, section 3, on page 35, authorizes the service of such warrant in the nighttime, as well as in the daytime, when the affiant is positive that the property is on the person or in the place to be searched. The Senator will notice in this case that search warrants may issue not only for the search of structures but of the person, and in the nighttime, provided the appropriate affidavit is made.

Mr. CUMMINS. I intended to call attention to that a little later when I came to consider the details that arise in the administration of the proposed law. I am very glad, however, the Senator from Colorado has mentioned that particular danger or hardship. I repeat, that all that is necessary, in order to warrant the officer in serving the process in the nighttime and upon the person, is that the informant be positive with regard to the one fact which the Senator from Colorado has suggested.

I hope you will not become indignant about what I have already said, for it is merely a little step toward the enormity to follow. I read again from the section:

> Any property or papers held, secured, or used, or intended to be held, secured, or used, in violation of or in aid of a violation of * * * a treaty of the United States—

Mr. President, this country sometimes enters into agreements with other countries and they are called treaties. They ordinarily create obligations upon the part of our country and reciprocal obligations upon the part of the country with which we are dealing. Ordinarily they do not entail any obligation upon the individual citizen. I can not now recall a single instance in which any treaty of the United States has imposed upon a citizen an obligation. There may be such treaties; I will not say that there are not; but I can not at this moment recall any one of that character. So this search warrant goes to any person or to any premises to discover any paper or any property that may be used or held or which may be intended to be used or held in violation by the United States of any treaty.

When we remember the wide difference of opinion that exists with regard to treaties and their interpretation, their construction; when we remember what variety of judgment there is with respect to the obligations which a treaty puts upon the country, is it not monstrous to suggest that a search warrant may issue and the person of any citizen may be taken if it is alleged that he has any paper that has or may be used in violation of the treaty, and the paper itself may be removed from his possession and delivered to an officer of the Government? I venture to say that the extension of the search warrant to that degree has never before been attempted; at least, if it has been so attempted, I am not familiar with it.

What I have said, however, is still but an insignificant and trivial thing compared with what I am about to say. Reading again—

> To discover any property or papers held, secured, or used, or intended to be held, secured, or used, in violation of or in aid of a violation of any law of the United States, or of a treaty of the United States, or of the rights or obligations of the United States under the law of nations.

What is "the law of nations"? Who interprets it? Who construes it? Who is to decide what the rights and the obligations of the United States may be under the law of nations? If I have a paper in my possession which I intend to use as a part of an effort to sustain a certain proposal with respect to the rights and obligations of the United States under the law of nations, is it tolerable that a provost marshal can take my person, search it, and, discovering, may take that paper because it is not in harmony with the view which the then administration may take with regard to the rights and obligations of the United States under the law of nations? If I have a printing press which I intend to use as one of the instrumentalities for the publication of certain doctrines respecting the rights and obligations of the United States under the law of nations, and the Attorney General believes that those doctrines are not in harmony with the best interests of the country, are we to authorize his agent to come to my premises and take the printing press in order to prevent the publication and dissemination of my views concening the law of nations and our rights and obligations under it?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, if it will not interrupt the Senator——

Mr. CUMMINS. Not at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KENYON in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have been reading section 7 of this chapter, and I have been wondering whether, in the view of the Senator, the provisions of section 7 modify the provisions of section 1 and limit the scope of the operation of the search warrant?

Mr. CUMMINS. Not in any way. I think the thought underlying section 7 was that it was necessary to make an act criminal in order to attach the search-warrant privilege to it; but, in the first place, that is not accurate; and, in the second place, section 7 does not cover the whole ground covered by section 1, nor is it really in any way related to it; that is, section 1 would, in my judgment, operate independently of section 7. But that would make no difference. That would simply intensify the objection. I will come to section 7 directly; but in view of the question put by the Senator from Vermont, I only say that it is a section in which it is attempted to make one a criminal if he has in his possession any paper or property which is used—not intended to be used, but used—in violation of the law of nations. I do not believe the Senator from Vermont would insist that any court would ever hold a statute valid which would attempt to make one a criminal on account of the views which he entertains upon the law of nations and upon the rights and obligations of the United States growing out of the law of nations.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. No, Mr. President; my only thought was that stated in the form of a suggestion to the Senator that possibly the provisions of section 7, which define the offense, modify the provisions of section 1. To make what I have in mind clear, I will read the provision, which is as follows:

> SEC. 7. Whoever shall knowingly and willfully hold, secure, or use any property or papers, in violation of, or in aid of the violation of, any law of the United States, or of any treaty of the United States, or of the rights or obligations of the United States under the law of nations, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

The purpose of that section seems to be to define the offense with which the person is charged who is sought to be reached under the provisions of section 1 through a search warrant. Whoever drafted the bill, I think, had that thought in mind; and I wanted to know what the Senator's view of it was. That was all.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; as I remember it—and I am now speaking of what occurred before the Judiciary Committee, and I do not know whether I ought to do so or not—but I think it was urged there by some one that the search warrant could be used only as an aid to the enforcement of a criminal law, of a penal law; and whoever drew section 7 prepared it, I believe, in order to meet that objection. I remember that the Member who offered it stated at the time that he was not at all convinced of the necessity of section 7, but he did it to cover that objection. I do not think that it limits, in any way whatever, section 1. If the objection to which I have just referred were a valid one, it might sustain section 1 in certain respects.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, if the Senator please——

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Senator from Vermont will excuse me, and with the permission of the Senator from Iowa, I desire to state that I understood the committee allowed the search warrant to issue where there was a violation of law. There was no law furnishing violations of international law, and therefore we made such an act a crime, so as to bring it within these provisions.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understood that was the reason, but, of course, it does not limit section 1 in any way at all, because section 1 declares when a search warrant may be issued and what it may be used to accomplish.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, section 1 and section 7, being printed in italics, it appears that they are amendments recommended to the original draft of the bill. They were intended, as I think, by whoever drew them, to be construed together.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Vermont must remember the general course of the proposed statute through the committee. While I agree these are amendments in form now presented by the committee and approved by the committee, I can not quite accept the understanding of the Senator from Vermont with regard to the connection of the two, although my conclusions would be the same, because I think it is just as inhuman and as outrageous to attempt to make a crime of a difference with regard to the law of nations, as it is to issue a search warrant for evidence with which to convict the person who is accused of that crime. It must be remembered that this chapter does not require that the person to be searched shall be accused of any crime.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I think the Senator is mistaken about that. Does there not have to be a violation of the law, and can a search warrant be obtained unless it is stated in the application that a law has been violated? I understand that that has to be stated.

Mr. CUMMINS. No.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Senator will read further, he will see that it is set out.

Mr. CUMMINS (reading)—

A search warrant may be issued in conformity with the provisions of this act for the purpose of searching any premises or person to discover any property or papers, held, secured, or used, or intended to be held, secured, or used, in violation of or in aid of a violation of any law of the United States, or of a treaty of the United States, or of the rights or obligations of the United States under the law of nations.

The person who is in possession of the property may not be the violator at all.

Mr. OVERMAN. Here is subsection 2, which says:

The facts upon which his knowledge, or the grounds of his belief, if his application be based upon belief, that a violation of the rights or obligations of the United States under the law of nations, or treaty obligation, or statute of the United States as in this chapter provided has been, is being, or is intended to be accomplished.

There must be an allegation somewhere.

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly. I think there is no difference between the Senator from North Carolina and myself.

Mr. OVERMAN. I misunderstood the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. What I said was that the person from whom the property or the papers were to be taken, or the person to be searched, might not be the person who was accused of a violation of the law.

Mr. OVERMAN. Well, Mr. President, in the case of Boy-Ed and these conspirators over here, where they had deposited these papers which showed their guilt in somebody's house, it so happened that the agents of the Government went and broke in and got them without law. They were obliged to do it. They had no law for it, but this makes it a law. They went in and searched the premises and found those papers in a man's house. Would the Senator have us do that? Where we know that there is going on a conspiracy against this Government to violate the neutrality laws, and the conspirators deposit papers which show their guilt with some one else, ought we not to be able to go in there without force? Ought there not to be some law to allow us to go in there?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is the case this provides for.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; that is the trouble. This is simply another illustration of the process that has been going on here for the last four years, accelerated and emphasized in the last two years. A defect is discovered in the law, and it is suggested that we ought to remedy the defect. Everybody would be in favor of remedying the defect; but instead of limiting the amendment of the law to the case which has been discovered, to the defect which has become known, the law is made so broad and comprehensive that it reaches infinitely beyond the field in which legislation is necessary. I agree that the search warrant might properly be used in the case suggested by the Senator from North Carolina; but when we want to strengthen the law in such a case as that, if there is such a case, is it necessary to authorize a search warrant to seize the Senator from North Carolina and take from his pockets a paper which he may be intending to use as an argument in respect to our rights and obligations under the law of nations? That is just what is proposed in this statute.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I call the Senator's attention to the fact that that objection, as he knows, was made in our committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. And an appeal was made to the committee, and the committee appointed a subcommittee—it is a right interesting story—to carry out the Senator's idea. That very able subcommittee went out and tried to prepare a substitute, and when they came to do it they found that this was better than the substitute.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it is hardly fair to oppose some of the vagaries of the Judiciary Committee to the argument that I am now attempting to make. I have high regard for every member of that committee; but the fact that there was a subcommittee appointed, and that it brought in a different chapter, and that it was rejected and this was accepted in its stead is really no answer to the argument I am making.

Mr. OVERMAN. Not a bit.

Mr. CUMMINS. Generally speaking, I may say here and now that I think the work of that subcommittee was admirable; and if it had not been for two or three very serious blemishes—that is, from my standpoint—which I think might easily have been removed, I would have favored it.

Mr. OVERMAN. The reason I mentioned this, if the Senator pleases, was that if the Senator could—I do not know whether it can be done or not—get up an amendment that would enable us to do what we want to do, and limit it to what the Senator wants to do, I would accept it; but that is one of the hardest things I have ever tried to do. I do not know; the Senator may have an amendment. He is very wise, and the suggestions that he made to the committee impressed the committee very much; but when we tried it we found it exceedingly difficult.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think I ought to yield first to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG]. He has been on his feet two or three times.

Mr. WATSON. I beg pardon; I did not know that he had been.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will yield to the Senator from Indiana immediately thereafter.

Mr. WATSON. That is all right.

Mr. KELLOGG. I simply desired to ask whether the Senator had framed an amendment to cover the specific case that the chairman of the committee says is all he desires to cover?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not. I have not attempted to prepare any amendment to this chapter. It can not be amended.

I think that a substitute could be prepared, but I have had such ill success in making my views upon this subject meet the judgment of the Judiciary Committee that I did not try it.

Mr. KELLOGG. I understood the Senator from North Carolina to say that all he desired was a provision to cover the particular case mentioned, and that he would be glad to accept such an amendment, and I wondered whether any amendment had been prepared.

Mr. CUMMINS. I would be perfectly willing to see the law amended, or rather to see an addition to our present law that would embrace all such cases; but that has not really been the effort of those who drew this law—to make it reach just such cases as that, and no more.

Mr. KELLOGG. I understood the Senator from North Carolina to say that that would be satisfactory to him.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not so understand him.

Mr. OVERMAN. I said that if the Senator could frame an amendment that would cover that particular case, as to the person, I would accept it.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator from North Carolina will say that, after a conference with the Senator from Minnesota I will attempt it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should be glad to have it. I know it has been tried a half dozen times, and when you get into deep water the only way to do is to make it general.

Mr. CUMMINS. I now yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. I simply wanted to ask a question of the Senator from North Carolina. Inasmuch as he had made the observation that all he really wanted to do was to provide a remedy for the situation he describes, I wanted to ask him whether that was not at least a covert admission on his part that the provisions of the pending bill are too comprehensive?

Mr. OVERMAN. No; it is not. I said the committee tried to frame something which would cover that case, and nobody yet has been able to do it, so far as I can see.

Mr. WATSON. And if this case were covered, the Senator would not then insist upon the provisions of this bill?

Mr. OVERMAN. Why, certainly. It is only one phase of the matter that the Senator is talking about; and I admit the force of his suggestion as to that particular phase of it. The Senator did not understand me to say that I was not in favor of the search-warrant bill. My statement was only as to that particular phase.

Mr. CUMMINS. If we are permitted to disclose what occurred in the Judiciary Committee, I venture to remind the Senator from North Carolina that the Assistant Attorney General who had the matter in charge, and who is a very excellent lawyer, said that the effort to authorize the issuance of a search warrant under the law of nations was inadvisable and unnecessary. I think the Senator from North Carolina will agree to that.

Mr. OVERMAN. I agree, but I understood the Senator to say under the present law, unless we made it a crime, as we have done. I may have misunderstood. We went on to make it a crime in consequence of what he said to us. He said that unless we made it a crime, it would be inadvisable to do it; but we have made it a crime to violate the law.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not so understand it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I may have misunderstood.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. Ordinarily I am not troubled in the least to follow the course of any argument which the Senator from Iowa makes upon the floor. We do not always agree, but I find no difficulty ordinarily in getting his point of view and following the course of his argument; but I must confess that I am utterly unable to comprehend—and I should like the attention of the lawyers upon the floor—how the Senator reaches the conclusion that if he had a printing press in his possession, and was printing from that printing press some matter expressing his views concerning the rights or obligations of the United States under the laws of nations, that printing press would be subject to seizure. Likewise, I find it utterly impossible to understand how he reaches the conclusion that if he has in his breast pocket a paper which he intends to use in connection with an argument which he makes touching the rights and obligations of the United States under the law, it would be subject to seizure. Of course, I can conceive that some lawless Attorney General might want to seize it, and I likewise recognize that some idiot of a magistrate or a judge might possibly issue a search warrant. We can not help that. We can not talk about that. We must talk about the law. The law, if this bill is enacted into law, says that if the property which is to be seized is to be used in violation of a law of the United States, or if that property is to be used in violation of the rights or obligations of the United States under the law of nations, it is subject to seizure. Let me remark, and let me recall to the attention of the Senator from Iowa the fact, that the particular thing which was in mind was something about like this:

Here is some one who has accumulated a lot of arms in this country, to be utilized in carrying on unlawful warfare against some other country. The statute was intended to permit the seizure of those arms. Now, I speak of that as being the evil to be remedied; but I ask the Senator from Iowa whether he proposes to assert before this body of lawyers that in his judgment, if he had a printing press in his possession, and was printing on that printing press matter expressive of his views concerning the rights and obligations of the United States under the laws of nations, it would be subject to seizure under this law? I so understood the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think the statute would stand for a moment before any court; but if it did stand——

Mr. WALSH. Exactly; I am not asking the Senator whether, in his view, it would be constitutional if it did so provide. I am asking if he seriously desires to have it understood that in terms this statute would authorize the seizure of that printing press?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think so.

Mr. WALSH. Well, but how?

Mr. CUMMINS. I can easily point out how. I tried to do it.

Mr. WALSH. I should be glad to hear the Senator on that point.

Mr. CUMMINS. The statute says that a search warrant may be issued if any person has any property or papers intended to be used in violation of the rights or obligations of the United States under the law of nations. Now, I assume that means to be used for the purpose of overturning a right or repudiating an obligation. What does it mean when it says this may be done if the property or paper is to be used in violation of the rights of the United States? What are the rights of the United States under the law of nations in a particular case? They are matters upon which men differ widely. Where is the standard of right?

Mr. WALSH. Why, Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. If I use any property—a printing press or any other kind of property—as an instrumentality to overthrow the rights of the United States under the law of nations, I have exposed myself to the operation of the search warrant under this section.

Mr. WALSH. I must express my astonishment at the view expressed by the Senator from Iowa, good lawyer as he is; but it does occur to me that you could scarcely describe the printing press as a deadly weapon if it was used in the way I have described.

Mr. CUMMINS. Sometimes it is very deadly.

Mr. WALSH. Well, of course, figuratively speaking.

Mr. CUMMINS. But this statute is not limited to deadly weapons. It is not limited to weapons of any kind.

Mr. WALSH. No; but it is not used in violating a right of the United States.

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. It is not used in violating an obligation of the United States.

Mr. CUMMINS. If we had a criminal statute which defined the rights of the United States, and said that anyone who violated the statute should be subject to a search warrant, the case would be very different; but we have said that the search warrant shall go not only when a law of the United States is violated, but whenever a right of the United States under the law of nations is violated.

Mr. WALSH. And against the property used in the violation.

Mr. CUMMINS. The property or papers or whatever is used or intended to be used in the violation.

But, Mr. President, after having shown what section 1 provides, which I think is anomalous in the whole history of this Nation, I now come to another part of the bill, which is in the last degree objectionable, and I can not understand how lawyers anywhere defend it. It is found on page 36. I read from section 4, beginning with line 6:

> And the person making such seizure—

That is, the seizure of the property or papers.

Mr. KELLOGG. What line is that?

Mr. CUMMINS. I withdraw that. I shall have to begin further back. I read the entire section:

> SEC. 4. Whenever any property or papers shall be seized and detained on a search warrant issued under the provisions of this chapter, the owner or claimant thereof may forthwith file with the judge or commissioner issuing said warrant, his petition setting out his title or claim of ownership to, or right to the custody of such property or papers, and any other facts legally tending to require restoration of the property or papers to the claimant; whereupon such judge or commissioner, after due notice, not exceeding five days, to the United States attorney for the district and the person making such seizure shall proceed to speedily hear and determine the case, and order the property or papers restored to the owner or claimant, or shall order the same retained in the custody of the person seizing them to be used as evidence in any case or proceeding, civil or criminal, in which the United States may be interested, or to be otherwise disposed of according to law.

Mr. President, I do not intend to confuse that issue by any inadequate words of my own. I shall content myself with a reference to an opinion rendered by the Supreme Court of the United States which is still the law of the land and to which Congress should pay some respect. It is the case of Boyd against The United States, in One hundred and sixteenth United States Reports, page 616. I intend to read it at some length, because I want the RECORD to show what we have believed the law to be on this subject.

Mr. WATSON. When was the case decided?

Mr. CUMMINS. It was decided in 1885.

Mr. JONES of Washington. May I ask the Senator if he is directing his remarks to the point that it would permit the person seizing the papers to keep them in his custody and use them in court?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am reading the report to show what the Supreme Court thinks the fourth amendment to the Constitution and what also the fifth amendment to the Constitution means with regard to search and seizure and the use of the things seized as evidence against the person from whom they were seized.

Mr. STERLING. Will the Senator kindly give the citation again?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am considering now Boyd against The United States, in One hundred and sixteenth United States, page 616. This was a suit brought under a penal statute of the United States for the forfeiture of goods which it was alleged had been undervalued and brought into the country in violation of the customs law. I pass over the statement of the case, because it is not material to the point I have in mind. Justice Bradley delivered the opinion. I must state these facts. The court ordered the production of certain books and papers on the part of the defendant, and under the statute as it was at that time if the defendant failed to produce the books and papers under the order the matter charged by the prosecution to be in the books or papers, or that would be shown by the books and papers, was be taken as confessed. I read, beginning on page 621:

> The clauses of the Constitution to which it is contended that these laws—

Namely, the one that I have just mentioned—> are repugnant are the fourth and fifth amendments. The fourth declares—

Then quoting—

> "the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched and the persons or things to be seized."

I may say in passing that this act does not require any such description as is provided for in the Constitution.

The fifth article, amongst other things, declares that no person "shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself."

But, in regard to the fourth amendment, it is contended that, whatever might have been alleged against the constitutionality of the acts of 1863 and 1867, that of 1874, under which the order in the present case was made, is free from constitutional objection, because it does not authorize the search and seizure of books and papers, but only requires the defendant or claimant to produce them. That is so; but it declares that if he does not produce them the allegations which it is affirmed they will prove shall be taken as confessed. This is tantamount to compelling their production, for the prosecuting attorney will always be sure to state the evidence expected to be derived from them as strongly as the case will admit of.

I read the concluding sentence of that part of the opinion:

It is our opinion, therefore, that a compulsory production of a man's private papers to establish a criminal charge against him, or to forfeit his property, is within the scope of the fourth amendment to the Constitution, in all cases in which a search and seizure would be, because it is a material ingredient and effects the sole object and purpose of search and seizure.

I have read so much because I wanted to make it clear that this opinion is an opinion upon the validity of search warrants. You will observe that the distinguished judge declared that this order, under the law, was the equivalent of a search warrant and must be judged by the principles which control and determine that process of the court. I read again:

The principal question, however, remains to be considered: Is a search and seizure, or, what is equivalent thereto, a compulsory production of a man's private papers, to be used in evidence against him in a proceeding to forfeit his property for alleged fraud against the revenue laws—is such a proceeding for such a purpose an unreasonable search and seizure within the meaning of the fourth amendment of the Constitution, or is it a legitimate proceeding? It is contended by the counsel for the Government that it is a legitimate proceeding, sanctioned by long usage and the authority of judicial decision. No doubt long usage, acquiesced in by the courts, goes a long way to prove that there is some plausible ground or reason for it in the law or in the historical facts which have imposed a particular construction of the law favorable to such usage. It is a maxim that consuetudo est optimus interpres legum, and another maxim that contemporanea expositio est optima et fortissima in lege. But we do not find any long usage or any contemporary construction of the Constitution which would justify any of the acts of Congress now under consideration. As before stated, the act of 1863 was the first act in this country, and, we might say, either in this country or in England, so far as we have been able to ascertain, which authorized the search and seizure of a man's private papers or the compulsory production of them for the purpose of using them in evidence against him in a criminal case or in a proceeding to enforce the forfeiture of his property.

Even the act under which the obnoxious writs of assistance were issued—

And I suppose if we had lived in the Revolutionary days those who favor the search warrant here provided for would be led to defend the writ of assistance which finally culminated in the War of the Revolution—

Even the act under which the obnoxious writs of assistance were issued did not go as far as this—

That is, the statute then being considered—but only authorized the examination of ships and vessels and persons found therein for the purpose of finding goods prohibited to be imported or exported, or on which the duties were not paid, and to enter into and search any suspected vaults, cellars, or warehouses for such goods—

And so forth.

I intend to ask that I may print as a part of my remarks the entire opinion, but I will content myself with reading brief extracts from——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CUMMINS (reading)—

In order to ascertain the nature of the proceedings intended by the fourth amendment to the Constitution under the terms "unreasonable searches and seizures," it is only necessary to recall the contemporary or then recent history of the controversies on the subject, both in this country and in England. The practice had obtained in the Colonies of issuing writs of assistance to the revenue officers, empowering them, in their discretion, to search suspected places for smuggled goods, which James Otis pronounced "the worst instrument of arbitrary power, the most destructive of English liberty, and the fundamental principles of law, that ever was found in an English law book," since they placed "the liberty of every man in the hands of every petty officer." This was in February, 1761, in Boston, and the famous debate in which it occurred was perhaps the most prominent event which inaugurated the resistance of the Colonies to the oppressions of the mother country. "Then and there," said John Adams, "then and there was the first scene of the first act of opposition to the arbitrary claims of Great Britain. Then and there the child Independence was born."

In the course of the opinion from which I am reading copious extracts were made from the opinion of Lord Camden which altogether from every standpoint is probably the most lucid exposition of private right and human liberty that can be discovered in English literature. He delivered the opinion in the case of Entick v. Carrington and Three Other King's Messengers, and it is reported in Howell's State Trials, page 1029. The case to which I have just referred was a case decided, as I remember, in 1762, very shortly before the revolution, and it was an opinion which furnished the patriots of that time in America not only their inspiration but their argument against the oppression of the mother country. Lord Camden said:

The great end for which men entered into society was to secure their property. That right is preserved sacred and incommunicable in all instances where it has not been taken away or abridged by some public law for the good of the whole. The cases where the right of property is set aside by positive law are various. Distresses, executions, forfeitures, taxes, etc., are all of this description, wherein every man by common consent gives up that right for sake of justice and the general good. By the laws of England every invasion of private property, be it ever so minute, is a trespass. No man can set his foot upon my ground without my license but he is liable to an action, though the damage be nothing.

I read again from Lord Camden's opinion:

Lastly, it is urged as an argument of utility, that such a search is a means of detecting offenders by discovering evidence. I wish some cases had been shown where the law forceth evidence out of the owner's custody by process. There is no process against papers in civil causes. It has been often tried but never prevailed. Nay, where the adversary has by force or fraud got possession of your own proper evidence, there is no way to get it back but by action. In the criminal law such a proceeding was never heard of; and yet there are some crimes, such, for instance, as murder, rape, robbery, and house breaking, to say nothing of forgery and perjury, that are more atrocious than libeling. But our law has provided no paper search in these cases to help forward the conviction. Whether this proceedeth from the gentleness of the law toward criminals, or from a consideration that such a power would be more pernicious to the innocent than useful to the public I will not say. It is very certain that the law obligeth no man to accuse himself; because the necessary means of compelling self-accusation, falling upon the innocent as well as the guilty, would be both cruel and unjust; and it would seem that search for evidence is disallowed upon the same principle. Then, too, the innocent would be confounded with the guilty.

Justice Bradley, in commenting upon this opinion, declared that there is no dissent from it except in the infamous utterances of Chief Justice Scroggs and his associates, whose labors in the field of English law bring shame to the cheek of every man who values English liberty and English civilization.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. The particular section the Senator is now considering provides a remedy for the person against whom the search warrant has been sued out. I take it the Senator does not object to giving the right to the person to go before the court and have it determined whether the property shall be turned over to him or not. I presume the Senator's remark is aimed at the provision which authorizes the court to determine that the property shall be held in the custody of a certain officer.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is no remedy. The case that I am reading from—that is, the case in One hundred and sixteenth United States—was an order for the production of books and papers where the court had a complete remedy.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand.

Mr. CUMMINS. Where the court had complete jurisdiction.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand.

Mr. CUMMINS. Yet the Supreme Court of the United States held that the law which required either the production of those books and papers or the admission that the claim with respect to them was true was unconstitutional. You might just as well say, Mr. President, that a law which permitted a man to be tried after he had been decapitated gave him a remedy. After you have seized the papers, the books, and taken them into the possession of the Government it makes no difference then what is done with them.

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course, that argument is directed against the whole proposition to issue search warrants as provided in this chapter.

Mr. CUMMINS. Against every part of it, so far as the use of papers as evidence against one accused of crime is concerned. It does not apply to the common use of search warrants.

Mr. FLETCHER. Let me ask the Senator in this connection, suppose a counterfeiting outfit is seized, does the Senator hold that under the law forbidding the use of counterfeiting implements and tools and paraphernalia that property could not be used as evidence against the defendant?

Mr. CUMMINS. No. The Senator from Florida can easily, I think, perceive the distinction. A search warrant is issued in a counterfeiting case and the counterfeiting tools are seized in the possession of the person accused. They may be used as evidence for whatsoever their possession will prove; but suppose the counterfeiter has in his pocket a letter in which he admits that he has been guilty of the offense, and the officer seizes the letter, does the Senator say it can be offered in evidence against him or that it can be lawfully taken from his person? There is a vast difference between the case put by the Senator from Florida and the searches and seizures that are warranted by this chapter.

Mr. FLETCHER. However, the particular section the Senator is discussing provides a remedy for the person whose property or whose effects or implements or paraphernalia may be seized under a search warrant. It does more than that. The court may order that the property shall be turned over or held by the officer making the search for subsequent use. It does not say how it may be used, but it orders it to be held. It is entirely conceivable that the material or property or paper, whatever it may be, that is seized by the issue of the search warrant may be a very important piece of evidence in the case. I am unable to see why the law should not make it evidence, even although this perhaps does not go that far. This section simply turns it over, and it is a question to be determined later as to how it can be used in evidence. It does say that the same may be retained in the custody of the person seizing it to be used as evidence in a case or a proceeding civil or criminal. It is a question for the court to determine later on as to how that may be introduced in evidence, whether it is relevant, whether it is material, whether it is competent, or whether it is a proper piece of evidence to be introduced against the defendant.

The main argument of the Senator is addressed largely against the use of search warrants entirely, but in this particular section it is sought to give a remedy to the defendant whose property is seized. It depends on what develops at the hearing on that sort of an application whether the letter or document or material is such that it can be introduced in evidence at the trial.

Mr. CUMMINS. All I can do, Mr. President, is to submit the opinion of the Supreme Court from which I have been reading as again the views just stated by the Senator from Florida. If they are not inconsistent with each other, then my argument goes for nothing.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to address a question to the Senator from Iowa.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. WALSH. Is it the understanding of the Senator from Iowa that this statute would authorize the seizure of a letter which one had on his person admitting that he had committed a crime?

Mr. CUMMINS. It says so.

Mr. WALSH. That is not my understanding of it.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the letter is a paper.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator instances that case as falling under the statute; and I inquire of him if it is his understanding of the statute that it would, whether justifiable or not, in terms authorize the seizure of a letter which one had on his person containing an admission that he had committed a crime?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not catch the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator from Iowa made a remark in the colloquy he just had with the Senator from Florida which led me to believe that the Senator is of the opinion that this statute, if it becomes a statute, would authorize a search warrant to seize a letter which was on the person of one, containing an admission of that person that he had committed a crime, the letter to be used in evidence against him of the commission of the crime.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think the statute directs that the letter shall be received in evidence.

Mr. WALSH. No.

Mr. CUMMINS. But it does authorize the seizure of the letter, in my opinion.

Mr. WALSH. That is the way I understood the Senator. But how can the Senator reach that conclusion when the statute expressly declares that it is only such papers as have been used, or are intended to be used, in the commission of a crime?

Mr. CUMMINS. The language is "held, secured, or used, or intended to be held, secured, or used, in violation of or in aid of a violation of any law of the United States."

Mr. WALSH. Exactly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I see the distinction which the Senator from Montana makes; that is, that the officer should go over the person and if he finds a letter which is simply an admission that he has been guilty of an offense he should not take that letter?

Mr. WALSH. Not at all. He must first particularly describe the paper which he intends to seize, and in particularly describing it if he describes it as a paper not that had been used in the commission of a crime, not that it was intended to be used in the commission of a crime or a violation of the law, but one containing an admission that a crime had been committed, the search warrant would not issue.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from Montana has forgotten or possibly overlooked the language of the chapter with regard to the character of the affidavit which must be made. It says:

> As full and particular a description of the property or papers sought for, and of the place or places where the same are known or believed to be, as his knowledge or belief will permit, which said description shall recite the general characteristics of the property or papers sought or some fair proportion thereof, with such reasonable particularity as may be sufficient to identify the same when found.

Mr. WALSH. No; I had not overlooked that; but, however general the description may be, it must be a description not of a paper containing an admission that a crime had been committed, but it must be a paper that was used in the commission of a crime, as, for instance, a forged passport.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am inclined to think that, technically speaking, in the case of a counterfeiter, which was the case put, the letter which I have imagined to be on the person of the accused admitting the offense would not be within the terms of the search warrant; but it is not difficult to imagine an instance in which the paper which was used in violation of the law or against the law of nations would constitute at once the instrument of violation and the admission of guilt.

Mr. WALSH. Undoubtedly. So if one accumulated a vast amount of dynamite for the purpose of blowing up bridges it would at once be concluded that it was intended to be used in the commission of a crime, and it would likewise be evidence; but it must have the characteristic of having been used or being intended to be used.

Let me remark that I simply address these questions to the Senator from Iowa for the purpose of directing his attention, and the attention of the Senate, to the fact that this is not a search warrant to search for evidence generally, but only to search for property and for documents that have been used or are intended to be used in the commission of crime.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I add one more quotation from the opinion of Boyd against the United States. It is from page 630:

> Can we doubt that when the fourth and fifth amendments to the Constitution of the United States were penned and adopted the language of Lord Camden was relied on as expressing the true doctrine on the subject of searches and seizures, and as furnishing the true criteria of the reasonable and "unreasonable" character of such seizures? Could the men who proposed those amendments, in the light of Lord Camden's opinion, have put their hands to a law like those of March 3, 1863, and March 2, 1867, before recited? If they could not, would they have approved the first section of the act of June 22, 1874, which was adopted as a substitute for the previous law? It seems to us that the question can not admit of a doubt. They never would have approved of them. The struggles against arbitrary power, in which they had been engaged for more than 20 years, would have been too deeply engraved in their memories to have allowed them to approve of such insidious disguises of the old grievance which they had so deeply abhorred.

The court proceeds, and finally holds the law under consideration to be unconstitutional. The whole opinion is full of the finest spirit, as well as of the soundest law; and it is the law at this time; it has never been modified or reversed.

Let me be fully understood. There are a great many instances that could be reached under Chapted XI that would be constitutional. A great many crimes possibly could be uncovered or discovered that ought to be uncovered and discovered and punished under Chapter XI. My objection to it is the length to which it goes; my objection to it is the vagueness witlf which it describes the circumstances under which the search warrant can be issued; my objection to it is the attempt to establish a censorship infinitely more obnoxious than the censorship which we discussed under Chapter II of the present measure.

Mr. President, I have already pursued this subject to much greater length than I had any dream of doing when I began. I close with the suggestion that I am not unfamiliar with the opinions of the Supreme Court of the United States in recent years, relaxing the rule applicable to the individual, so far as corporations are concerned. It has been held over and over again that the papers and books of corporations are not to be guarded as are the books and papers of an individual. In saying what I have it must not be thought that I am contending that the officer of a corporation can not be compelled to produce the books and papers of the corporation, even though they may incriminate him or another officer of the corporation.

In order to illustrate just what modifications of the law have taken place with regard to corporations as affected by the fourth and fifth amendments of the Constitution, I desire to cite Wilson v. The United States (221 U. S., 361).

Mr. President, it is not agreeable to me to be so frequently a protestant against the legislation which seems to be thought necessary by the administration, but I would be false to my conception of duty, to my conception of free institutions, and to my deep desire to preserve our institutions unimpaired in the mighty struggle through which we are passing should I refrain from expressing my views in regard to such legislation.

These things compel me to call attention to attempts, as I believe them to be, to infringe unnecessarily and unjustly upon the liberties and the privileges of the freemen of the United States.

APPENDIX.

BOYD V. UNITED STATES.

Error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

[Argued Dec. 11, 14, 1885.—Decided Feb. 1, 1886.]

The fifth section of the act of June 22, 1874, entitled "An act to amend the customs revenue laws," etc., which section authorizes a court of the United States, in revenue cases, on motion of the Government attorney, to require the defendant or claimant to produce in court his private books, invoices and papers, or else the allegations of the attorney to be taken as confessed: Held, To be unconstitutional and void as applied to suits for penalties, or to establish a forfeiture of the party's goods, as being repugnant to the fourth and fifth amendments of the Constitution.

Where proceedings were in rem to establish a forfeiture of certain goods alleged to have been fraudulently imported without paying the duties thereon, pursuant to the twelfth section of said act: Held, That an order of the court made under said fifth section, requiring the claimants of the goods to produce a certain invoice in court for the inspection of the Government attorney, and to be offered in evidence by him, was an unconstitutional exercise of authority, and that the inspection of the invoice by the attorney, and its admission in evidence, were erroneous and unconstitutional proceedings.

It does not require actual entry upon premises and search for and seizure of papers to constitute an unreasonable search and seizure within the meaning of the fourth amendment; a compulsory production of a party's private books and papers to be used against himself or his property in a criminal or penal proceeding, or for a forfeiture, is within the spirit and meaning of the amendment.

It is equivalent to a compulsory production of papers, to make the nonproduction of them a confession of the allegations which it is pretended they will prove.

A proceeding to forfeit a person's goods for an offense against the laws, though civil in form, and whether in rem or in personam, is a "criminal case" within the meaning of that part of the fifth amendment which declares that no person "shall be compelled, in any criminal case, to be a witness against himself."

The seizure or compulsory production of a man's private papers to be used in evidence against him is equivalent to compelling him to be a witness against himself, and, in a prosecution for crime, penalty or forfeiture, is equally within the prohibition of the fifth amendment.

Both amendments relate to the personal security of the citizen. They nearly run into and mutually throw light upon each other. When the thing forbidden in the fifth amendment, namely, compelling a man to be a witness against himself, is the object of a search and seizure of his private papers, it is an "unreasonable search and seizure" within the fourth amendment.

Search and seizure of a man's private papers to be used in evidence for the purpose of convicting him of a crime, recovering a penalty, or of forfeiting his property, is totally different from the search and seizure of stolen goods, dutiable articles on which the duties have not been paid, and the like, which rightfully belong to the custody of the law.

Constitutional provisions for the security of person and property should be liberally construed.

This was an information against 35 cases of polished plate glass. The facts which make the case are stated in the opinion of the court. Judgment in favor of the United States. The claimants sued out this writ of error.

Mr. Edwin B. Smith for plaintiff in error. Mr. Stephen G. Clarke was with him on the brief.

Mr. Solicitor General for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Bradley delivered the opinion of the court.

This was an information filed by the district attorney of the United States in the District Court for the Southern District of New York, in July, 1884, in a cause of seizure and forfeiture of property, against 35 cases of plate glass, seized by the collector as forfeited to the United States, under section 12 of the "Act to amend the customs revenue laws, and to repeal moieties," passed June 22, 1874, 18 Stat., 186.

It is declared by that section that any owner, importer, consignee, etc., who shall, with intent to defraud the revenue, make, or attempt to make, any entry of imported merchandise, by means of any fraudulent or false invoice, affidavit, letter, or paper, or by means of any false statement, written or verbal, or who shall be guilty of any willful act or omission by means whereof the United States shall be deprived of the lawful duties, or any portion thereof, accruing upon the merchandise, or any portion thereof, embraced or referred to in such invoice, affidavit, letter, paper, or statement, or affected by such act or omission, shall for each offense be fined in any sum not exceeding $5,000 nor less than $50, or be imprisoned for any time not exceeding two years, or both; and, in addition to such fine, such merchandise shall be forfeited.

The charge was that the goods in question were imported into the United States to the port of New York, subject to the payment of duties; and that the owners or agents of said merchandise, or other person unknown, committed the alleged fraud, which was described in the words of the statute. The plaintiffs in error entered a claim for the goods, and pleaded that they did not become forfeited in manner and form as alleged. On the trial of the cause it became important to show the quantity and value of the glass contained in 29 cases previously imported. To do this the district attorney offered in evidence an order made by the district judge under section 5 of the same act of June 22, 1874, directing notice under seal of the court to be given to the claimants, requiring them to produce the invoice of the 29 cases. The claimants, in obedience to the notice, but objecting to its validity and to the constitutionality of the law, produced the invoice; and when it was offered in evidence by the district attorney they objected to its reception on the ground that, in a suit for forfeiture, no evidence can be compelled from the claimants themselves, and also that the statute, so far as it compels production of evidence to be used against the claimants is unconstitutional and void.

The evidence being received, and the trial closed, the jury found a verdict for the United States, condemning the 35 cases of glass which were seized, and judgment of forfeiture was given. This judgment was affirmed by the circuit court, and the decision of that court is now here for review.

As the question raised upon the order for the production by the claimants of the invoice of the 29 cases of glass, and the proceedings had thereon, is not only an important one in the determination of the present case, but is a very grave question of constitutional law, involving the personal security, and privileges and immunities of the citizen, we will set forth the order at large. After the title of the court and term, it reads as follows, to wit:

"The United States of America v. E. A. B., 1—35, Thirty-five Cases of Plate Glass.

"Whereas the attorney of the United States for the Southern District of New York has filed in this court a written motion in the above-entitled action, showing that said action is a suit or proceeding other than criminal, arising under the customs revenue laws of the United States, and not for penalties, now pending undetermined in this court, and that in his belief a certain invoice or paper belonging to and under the control of the claimants herein will tend to prove certain allegations set forth in said written motion, hereto annexed, made by him on behalf of the United States in said action, to wit, the invoice from the Union Plate Glass Co. or its agents, covering the 29 cases of plate glass marked G. H. B., imported from Liverpool, England, into the port of New York in the vessel Baltic, and entered by E. A. Boyd & Sons at the office of the collector of customs of the port and collection district aforesaid on April 7, 1884, on entry No. 47,108:

"Now, therefore, by virtue of the power in the said court vested by section 5 of the act of June 22, 1874, entitled 'An act to amend the customs-revenue laws and to repeal moieties,' it is ordered that a notice under the seal of this court, and signed by the clerk thereof, be issued to the claimants, requiring them to produce the invoice or paper aforesaid before this court in the court rooms thereof in the United States post-office and courthouse building in the city of New York on October 16, 1884, at 11 o'clock a. m., and thereafter at such other times as the court shall appoint, and that said United States attorney and his assistants and such persons as he shall designate shall be allowed before the court, and under its direction and in the presence of the attorneys for the claimants, if they shall attend, to make examination of said invoice or paper and to take copies thereof; but the claimants or their agents or attorneys shall have, subject to the order of the court, the custody of such invoice or paper, except pending such examination."

The fifth section of the act of June 22, 1874, under which this order was made, is in the following words, to wit:

"In all suits and proceedings other than criminal arising under any of the revenue laws of the United States, the attorney representing the Government, whenever in his belief any business book, invoice, or paper belonging to, or under the control of, the defendant or claimant, will tend to prove any allegation made by the United States, may make a written motion, particularly describing such book, invoice, or paper, and setting forth the allegation which he expects to prove; and thereupon the court in which suit or proceeding is pending may, at its discretion, issue a notice to the defendant or claimant to produce such book, invoice, or paper in court, at a day and hour to be specified in said notice, which, together with a copy of said motion, shall be served formally on the defendant or claimant by the United States marshal by delivering to him a certified copy thereof, or otherwise serving the same as original notices of suit in the same court are served; and if the defendant or claimant shall fail or refuse to produce such book, invoice, or paper in obedience to such notice, the allegations stated in the said motion shall be taken as confessed, unless his failure or refusal to produce the same shall be explained to the satisfaction of the court. And if produced the said attorney shall be permitted, under the direction of the court, to make examination (at which examination the defendant, or claimant, or his agent, may be present) of such entries in said book, invoice, or paper as relate to or tend to prove the allegation aforesaid, and may offer the same in evidence on behalf of the United States. But the owner of said books and papers, his agent or attorney, shall have, subject to the order of the court, the custody of them, except pending their examination in court as aforesaid." (18 Stat., 187.)

This section was passed in lieu of the second section of the act of March 2, 1867, entitled "An act to regulate the disposition of the proceeds of fines, penalties, and forfeitures incurred under the laws relating to the customs, and for other purposes" (14 Stat., 547), which section of said last-mentioned statute authorized the district judge, on complaint and affidavit that any fraud on the revenue had been committed by any person interested or engaged in the importation of merchandise, to issue his warrant to the marshal to enter any premises where any invoices, books, or papers were deposited relating to such merchandise, and take possession of such books and papers and produce them before said judge, to be subject to his order, and allowed to be examined by the collector, and to be retained as long as the judge should deem necessary. This law, being in force at the time of the revision, was incorporated into sections 3091, 3092, 3093 of the Revised Statutes.

The section last recited was passed in lieu of the seventh section of the act of March 3, 1863, entitled "An act to prevent and punish frauds upon the revenue, to provide for the more certain and speedy collection of claims in favor of the United States, and for other purposes." (12 Stat., 737.) The seventh section of this act was, in substance, the same as the second section of the act of 1867, except that the warrant was to be directed to the collector instead of the marshal. It was the first legislation of the kind that ever appeared on the statute book of the United States, and, as seen from its date, was adopted at a period of great national excitement, when the powers of the Government were subjected to a severe strain to protect the national existence.

The clauses of the Constitution to which it is contended that these laws are repugnant are the fourth and fifth amendments. The fourth declares, "The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched and the persons or things to be seized." The fifth article, amongst other things, declares that no person "shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself."

But, in regard to the fourth amendment, it is contended that, whatever might have been alleged against the constitutionality of the acts of 1863 and 1867, that of 1874, under which the order in the present case was made, is free from constitutional objection, because it does not authorize the search and seizure of books and papers, but only requires the defendant or claimant to produce them. That is so; but it declares that if he does not produce them, the allegations which it is affirmed they will prove shall be taken as confessed. This is tantamount to compelling their production; for the prosecuting attorney will always be sure to state the evidence expected to be derived from them as strongly as the case will admit of. It is true that certain aggravating incidents of actual search and seizure, such as forcible entry into a man's house and searching amongst his papers, are wanting, and to this extent the proceeding under the act of 1874 is a mitigation of that which was authorized by former acts; but it accomplishes the substantial object of those acts in forcing from a party evidence against himself. It is our opinion, therefore, that a compulsory production of a man's private papers to establish a criminal charge against him, or to forfeit his property, is within the scope of the fourth amendment to the Constitution in all cases in which a search and seizure would be, because it is a material ingredient and effects the sole object and purpose of search and seizure.

The principal question, however, remains to be considered. Is a search and seizure, or, what is equivalent thereto, a compulsory production of a man's private papers, to be used in evidence against him in a proceeding to forfeit his property for alleged fraud against the revenue laws—is such a proceeding for such a purpose an "unreasonable search and seizure" within the meaning of the fourth amendment to the Constitution? Or, is it a legitimate proceeding? It is contended by the counsel for the Government that it is a legitimate proceeding, sanctioned by long usage and the authority of judicial decision. No doubt long usage, acquiesced in by the courts, goes a long way to prove that there is some plausible ground or reason for it in the law or the historical facts which have imposed a particular construction of the law favorable to such usage. It is a maxim that, consuetudo est optimus interpres legum; and another maxim that, contemporanea expositio est optima et fortissima in lege. But we do not find any long usage, or any contemporary construction of the Constitution which would justify any of the acts of Congress now under consideration. As before stated, the act of 1863 was the first act in this country, and, we might say, either in this country or in England, so far as we have been able to ascertain, which authorized the search and seizure of a man's private papers, or the compulsory production of them for the purpose of using them in evidence against him in a criminal case or in a proceeding to enforce the forfeiture of his property.

"Even the act under which the obnoxious writs of assistance were issued (note by the court, 13 and 14 Car., 2, ch. 11, sec. 5) did not go as far as this, but only authorized the examination of ships and vessels, and persons found therein, for the purpose of finding goods prohibited to be imported or exported, or on which the duties were not paid, and to enter into and search any suspected vaults, cellars, or warehouses for such goods."

The search for and seizure of stolen or forfeited goods, or goods liable to duties and concealed to avoid the payment thereof, are totally different things from a search for and seizure of a man's private books and papers for the purpose of obtaining information therein contained, or of using them as evidence against him. The two things differ toto cœlo. In the one case the Government is entitled to the possession of the property; in the other it is not. The seizure of stolen goods is authorized by the common law, and the seizure of goods forfeited for a breach of the revenue laws, or concealed to avoid the duties payable on them, has been authorized by English statutes for at least two centuries past (note by the court, 12 Car., 2, ch. 19; 13 and 14 Car., 2, ch. 11; 6 and 7 W. & M., ch. 1; 6 Geo., 1, ch. 21; 26 Geo., 3, ch. 59; 29 Geo., 3, ch. 68, sec. 153, etc.; and see the article "Excise, etc.," in Burn's Justice, and Williams's Justice, passim, and Evans's Statutes, vol. 2, p. 221, subpages 176, 190, 225, 361, 431, 447), and the like seizures have been authorized by our own revenue acts from the commencement of the Government. The first statute passed by Congress to regulate the collection of duties, the act of July 31, 1789, 1 Stat., 29, 43, contains provisions to this effect. As this act was passed by the same Congress which proposed for adoption the original amendments to the Constitution, it is clear that the Members of that body did not regard searches and seizures of this kind as "unreasonable," and they are not embraced within the prohibition of the amendment. So also the supervision authorized to be exercised by officers of the revenue over the manufacture or custody of excisable articles, and the entries thereof in books required by law to be kept for their inspection, are necessarily excepted out of the category of unreasonable searches and seizures. So also the laws which provide for the search and seizure of articles and things which it is unlawful for a person to have in his possession for the purpose of issue or disposition, such as counterfeit coin, lottery tickets, implements of gambling, etc., are not within this category. Commonwealth v. Dana, 2 Met. (Mass.), 329. Many other things of this character might be enumerated. The entry upon premises made by a sheriff or other officer of the law for the purpose of seizing goods and chattels by virtue of a judicial writ, such as an attachment, a sequestration, or an execution, is not within the prohibition of the fourth or fifth amendment, or any other clause of the Constitution, nor is the examination of a defendant under oath after an ineffectual execution, for the purpose of discovering secreted property or credits, to be applied to the payment of a judgment against him, obnoxious to those amendments.

But when examined with care it is manifest that there is a total unlikeness of these official acts and proceedings to that which is now under consideration. In the case of stolen goods, the owner from whom they were stolen is entitled to their possession, and in the case of excisable or dutiable articles the Government has an interest in them for the payment of the duties thereon, and until such duties are paid has a right to keep them under observation or to pursue and drag them from concealment; and in the case of goods seized on attachment or execution the creditor is entitled to their seizure in satisfaction of his debt; and the examination of a defendant under oath to obtain a discovery of concealed property or credits is a proceeding merely civil to effect the ends of justice, and is no more than what the court of chancery would direct on a bill for discovery. Whereas by the proceeding now under consideration the court attempts to extort from the party his private books and papers to make him liable for a penalty or to forfeit his property.

"In order to ascertain the nature of the proceedings intended by the fourth amendment to the Constitution under the terms 'unreasonable searches and seizures,' it is only necessary to recall the contemporary or then recent history of the controversies on the subject, both in this country and in England. The practice had obtained in the Colonies of issuing writs of assistance to the revenue officers, empowering them, in their discretion, to search suspected places for smuggled goods, which James Otis pronounced 'the worst instrument of arbitrary power, the most destructive of English liberty and the fundamental principles of law, that ever was found in an English law book,' since they placed 'the liberty of every man in the hands of every petty officer.' (Note by the court: Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, 301–303 (5th ed., 368, 369). A very full and interesting account of this discussion will be found in the works of John Adams, vol. 2, Appendix A, pp. 523–525; vol. 10, pp. 183, 233, 244, 256, etc., and in Quincy's Reports, pp. 469–482; and see Paxton's Case, ditto, 51–57, which was argued in November of the same year (1761). An elaborate history of the writs of assistance is given in the Appendix to Quincy's Reports, above referred to, written by Horace Gray, jr., Esq., now a member of this court.) This was in February, 1761, in Boston, and the famous debate in which it occurred was perhaps the most prominent event which inaugurated the resistance of the Colonies to the oppressions of the mother country. 'Then and there,' said John Adams, 'then and there was the first scene of the first act of opposition to the arbitrary claims of Great Britain. Then and there the child Independence was born.'"

These things, and the events which took place in England immediately following the argument about writs of assistance in Boston, were fresh in the memories of those who achieved our independence and established our form of government. In the period from 1762, when the North Briton was started by John Wilkes, to April, 1766, when the House of Commons passed resolutions condemnatory of general warrants, whether for the seizure of persons or papers, occurred the bitter controversy between the English Government and Wilkes, in which the latter appeared as the champion of popular rights, and was, indeed, the pioneer in the contest which resulted in the abolition of some grievous abuses which had gradually crept into the administration of public affairs. Prominent and principal among these was the practice of issuing general warrants by the secretary of state, for searching private houses for the discovery and seizure of books and papers that might be used to convict their owner of the charge of libel. Certain numbers of the North Briton, particularly No. 45, had been very bold in denunciation of the Government, and were esteemed heinously libelous. By authority of the secretary's warrant Wilkes's house was searched and his papers were indiscriminately seized. For this outrage he sued the perpetrators and obtained a verdict of £1,000 against Wood, one of the party who made the search, and £4,000 against Lord Halifax, the secretary of state who issued the warrant. The case, however, which will always be celebrated as being the occasion of Lord Camden's memorable discussion of the subject, was that of Entick v. Carrington and Three Other King's Messengers, reported at length in Nineteenth Howell's State Trials, page 1029. The action was trespass for entering the plaintiff's dwelling house in November, 1762, and breaking open his desks, boxes, etc., and searching and examining his papers. The jury rendered a special verdict, and the case was twice solemnly argued at the bar. Lord Camden pronounced the judgment of the court in Michaelmas term, 1765, and the law as expounded by him has been regarded as settled from that time to this, and his great judgment on that occasion is considered as one of the landmarks of English liberty. It was welcomed and applauded by the lovers of liberty in the colonies as well as in the mother country. It is regarded as one of the permanent monuments of the British constitution and is quoted as such by the English authorities on that subject down to the present time. (Note by the court: See May's Constitutional History of England, vol. 3, (American ed., vol. 2) chap. 11; Broom's Constitutional Law, 558; Cox's Institutions of the English Government, 437.)

As every American statesman during our revolutionary and formative period as a nation was undoubtedly familiar with this monument of English freedom and considered it as the true and ultimate expression of constitutional law, it may be confidently asserted that its propositions were in the minds of those who framed the fourth amendment to the Constitution and were considered as sufficiently explanatory of what was meant by unreasonable searches and seizures. We think, therefore, it is pertinent to the present subject of discussion to quote somewhat largely from this celebrated judgment.

After describing the power claimed by the Secretary of State for issuing general search warrants, and the manner in which they were executed, Lord Camden says: "Such is the power, and, therefore, one would naturally expect that the law to warrant it should be clear in proportion as the power is exorbitant. If it is law, it will be found in our books; if it is not to be found there, it is not law.

"The great end for which men entered into society was to secure their property. That right is preserved sacred and incommunicable in all instances where it has not been taken away or abridged by some public law for the good of the whole. The cases where this right of property is set aside by positive law are various. Distresses, executions, forfeitures, taxes, etc., are all of this description, wherein every man by common consent gives up that right for the sake of justice and the general good. By the laws of England, every invasion of private property, be it ever so minute, is a trespass. No man can set his foot upon my ground without my license, but he is liable to an action though the damage be nothing, which is proved by every declaration in trespass where the defendant is called upon to answer for bruising the grass and even treading upon the soil. If he admits the fact, he is bound to show, by way of justification, that some positive law has justified or excused him. The justification is submitted to the judges, who are to look into the books and see if such a justification can be maintained by the text of the statute law or by the principles of the common law. If no such excuse can be found or produced, the silence of the books is an authority against the defendant and the plaintiff must have judgment. According to this reasoning, it is now incumbent upon the defendants to show the law by which this seizure is warranted. If that can not be done, it is a trespass.

"Papers are the owner's goods and chattels; they are his dearest property; and are so far from enduring a seizure that they will hardly bear an inspection; and though the eye can not by the laws of England be guilty of a trespass, yet where private papers are removed and carried away the secret nature of those goods will be an aggravation of the trespass, and demand more considerable damages in that respect. Where is the written law that gives any magistrate such a power? I can safely answer there is none; and therefore it is too much for us, without such authority, to pronounce a practice legal which would be subversive of all the comforts of society.

"But though it can not be maintained by any direct law, yet it bears a resemblance, as was urged, to the known case of search and seizure for stolen goods. I answer that the difference is apparent. In the one I am permitted to seize my own goods which are placed in the hands of a public officer till the felon's conviction shall entitle me to restitution; in the other, the party's own property is seized before and without conviction, and he has no power to reclaim his goods even after his innocence is declared by acquittal.

"The case of searching for stolen goods crept into the law by imperceptible practice. No less a person than my Lord Coke denied its legality (4 Inst., 176); and therefore if the two cases resembled each other more than they do we have no right, without an act of Parliament, to adopt a new practice in the criminal law, which was never yet allowed from all antiquity. Observe, too, the caution with which the law proceeds in this singular case. There must be a full charge upon oath of a theft committed. The owner must swear that the goods are lodged in such a place; he must attend at the execution of the warrant, to show them to the officer, who must see that they answer the description. * * *

"If it should be said that the same law which has with so much circumspection guarded the case of stolen goods from mischief, would likewise in this case protect the subject by adding proper checks; would require proofs beforehand; would call upon the servant to stand by and overlook; would require him to take an exact inventory, and deliver a copy: my answer is, that all these precautions would have been long since established by law if the power itself had been legal; and that the want of them is an undeniable argument against the legality of the thing."

Then, after showing that these general warrants for search and seizure of papers originated with the Star Chamber, and never had any advocates in Westminster Hall except Chief Justice Scroggs and his associates, Lord Camden proceeds to add:

"Lastly, it is urged as an argument of utility, that such a search is a means of detecting offenders by discovering evidence. I wish some cases had been shown where the law forceth evidence out of the owner's custody by process. There is no process against papers in civil causes. It has been often tried, but never prevailed. Nay, where the adversary has by force or fraud got possession of your own proper evidence there is no way to get it back but by action. In the criminal law such a proceeding was never heard of; and yet there are some crimes, such, for instance, as murder, rape, robbery, and housebreaking, to say nothing of forgery and perjury, that are more atrocious than libeling. But our law has provided no paper search in these cases to help forward the conviction. Whether this proceedeth from the gentleness of the law toward criminals, or from a consideration that such a power would be more pernicious to the innocent than useful to the public, I will not say. It is very certain that the law obligeth no man to accuse himself; because the necessary means of compelling self-accusation, falling upon the innocent as well as the guilty, would be both cruel and unjust, and it would seem that search for evidence is disallowed upon the same principle. Then, too, the innocent would be confounded with the guilty."

After a few further observations, his lordship concluded thus: "I have now taken notice of everything that has been urged upon the present point, and upon the whole we are all of opinion that the warrant to seize and carry away the party's papers in the case of a seditious libel is illegal and void." (Note by the court.—See further as to searches and seizures, Story on the Constitution, secs. 1901, 1902, and notes; Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, 299 (5th ed., 365); Sedgwick on Stat. and Const. Law, 2d ed., 498; Wharton Com. on Amer. Law, sec. 560; Robinson v. Richardson, 13 Gray, 454.)

The principles laid down in this opinion affect the very essence of constitutional liberty and security. They reach further than the concrete form of the case then before the court, with its adventitious circumstances; they apply to all invasions on the part of the Government and its employees of the sanctity of a man's home and the privacies of life. It is not the breaking of his doors and the rummaging of his drawers that constitute the essence of the offense, but it is the invasion of his indefeasible right of personal security, personal liberty, and private property, where that right has never been forfeited by his conviction of some public offense—it is the invasion of this sacred right which underlies and constitutes the essence of Lord Camden's judgment. Breaking into a house and opening boxes and drawers are circumstances of aggravation; but any forcible and compulsory extortion of a man's own testimony or of his private papers to be used as evidence to convict him of crime or to forfeit his goods is within the condemnation of that judgment. In this regard the fourth and fifth amendments run almost into each other.

Can we doubt that when the fourth and fifth amendments to the Constitution of the United States were penned and adopted the language of Lord Camden was relied on as expressing the true doctrine on the subject of searches and seizures, and as furnishing the true criteria of the reasonable and "unreasonable" character of such seizures? Could the men who proposed those amendments, in the light of Lord Camden's opinion, have put their hands to a law like those of March 3, 1863, and March 2, 1867, before recited? If they could not, would they have approved the fifth section of the act of June 22, 1874, which was adopted as a substitute for the previous laws? It seems to us that the question can not admit of a doubt. They never would have approved of them. The struggles against arbitrary power in which they had been engaged for more than 20 years would have been too deeply engraved in their memories to have allowed them to approve of such insidious disguises of the old grievance which they had so deeply abhorred.

The views of the First Congress on the question of compelling a man to produce evidence against himself may be inferred from a remarkable section of the judiciary act of 1789. The fifteenth section of that act introduced a great improvement in the law of procedure. The substance of it is found in section 724 of the Revised Statutes, and the section as originally enacted is as follows, to wit:

"All the said courts of the United States shall have power in the trial of actions at law, on motion and due notice thereof being given, to require the parties to produce books or writings in their possession or power, which contain evidence pertinent to the issue, in cases and under circumstances where they might be compelled to produce the same by the ordinary rules of proceeding in chancery; and if a plaintiff shall fail to comply with such order to produce books or writings, it shall be lawful for the courts, respectively, on motion, to give the like judgment for the defendant as in cases of nonsuit; and if a defendant shall fail to comply with such order to produce books or writings, it shall be lawful for the courts, respectively, on motion as aforesaid, to give judgment against him or her by default." (Note by the court: Sixty-two years later a similar act was passed in England, viz, the act of 14 and 15 Vict., c. 99, sec. 6. See Pollock on Power of courts to compel production of documents, 5.)

The restriction of this proceeding to "cases and under circumstances where they [the parties] might be compelled to produce the same [books or writings] by the ordinary rules of proceeding in chancery" shows the wisdom of the Congress of 1789. The court of chancery had for generations been weighing and balancing the rules to be observed in granting discovery on bills filed for that purpose, in the endeavor to fix upon such as would best secure the ends of justice. To go beyond the point to which that court had gone may well have been thought hazardous. Now it is elementary knowledge that one cardinal rule of the court of chancery is never to decree a discovery which might tend to convict the party of a crime, or to forfeit his property. (Note by the court: See Pollock on Production of documents, 27; 77 Law. Lib., 12 [8]. And any compulsory discovery by extorting the party's oath, or compelling the production of his private books and papers, to convict him of crime, or to forfeit his property, is contrary to the principles of a free government. It is abhorent to the instincts of an Englishman; it is abhorrent to the instincts of an American. It may suit the purposes of despotic power; but it can not abide the pure atmosphere of political liberty and personal freedom.

It is proper to observe that when the objectionable features of the acts of 1863 and 1867 were brought to the attention of Congress, it passed an act to obviate them. By the act of February 25, 1868 (15 Stat., 37), entitled "An act for the protection in certain cases of persons making disclosures as parties, or testifying as witnesses," the substance of which is incorporated in section 860 of the Revised Statutes, it was enacted "that no answer or other pleading of any party, and no discovery, or evidence obtained by means of any judicial proceeding from any party or witness in this or any foreign country, shall be given in evidence, or in any manner used against such party or witness, or his property or estate, in any court of the United States, or in any proceeding by or before any officer of the United States, in respect to any crime, or for the enforcement of any penalty or forfeiture by reason of any act or omission of such party or witness."

This act abrogated and repealed the most objectionable part of the act of 1867 (which was then in force) and deprived the Government officers of the convenient method afforded by it for getting evidence in suits of forfeiture; and this is probably the reason why the fifth section of the act of 1874 was afterwards passed. No doubt it was supposed that in this new form, couched as it was in almost the language of the fifteenth section of the old judiciary act, except leaving out the restriction to cases in which the court of chancery would decree a discovery, it would be free from constitutional objection. But we think it has been made to appear that this result has not been attained; and that the law, though very speciously worded, is still obnoxious to the prohibition of the fourth amendment of the Constitution, as well as of the fifth.

It has been thought by some respectable members of the profession that the two acts, that of 1868 and that of 1874, as being in pari materia, might be construed together so as to restrict the operation of the latter to cases other than those of forfeiture; and that such a construction of the two acts would obviate the necessity of declaring the act of 1874 unconstitutional. But as the act of 1874 was intended as a revisory act on the subject of revenue frauds and prosecutions therefor, and as it expressly repeals the second section of the act of 1867, but does not repeal the act of 1868, and expressly excepts criminal suits and proceedings, and does not except suits for penalties and forfeitures, it would hardly be admissible to consider the act of 1868 as having any influence over the construction of the act of 1874. For the purposes of this discussion we must regard the fifth section of the latter act as independent of the act of 1868.

Reverting, then, to the peculiar phraseology of this act, and to the information in the present case, which is founded on it, we have to deal with an act which expressly excludes criminal proceedings from its operation (though embracing civil suits for penalties and forfeitures), and with an information not technically a criminal proceeding, and neither, therefore, within the literal terms of the fifth amendment to the Constitution any more than it is within the literal terms of the fourth. Does this relieve the proceedings or the law from being obnoxious to the prohibitions of either? We think not; we think they are within the spirit of both.

We have already noticed the intimate relation between the two amendments. They throw great light on each other. For the "unreasonable searches and seizures" condemned in the fourth amendment are almost always made for the purpose of compelling a man to give evidence against himself, which in criminal cases is condemned in the fifth amendment; and compelling a man "in a criminal case to be a witness against himself," which is condemned in the fifth amendment, throws light on the question as to what is an "unreasonable search and seizure" within the meaning of the fourth amendment. And we have been unable to perceive that the seizure of a man's private books and papers to be used in evidence against him is substantially different from compelling him to be a witness against himself. We think it is within the clear intent and meaning of those terms. We are also clearly of opinion that proceedings instituted for the purpose of declaring the forfeiture of a man's property by reason of offenses committed by him, though they may be civil in form, are in their nature criminal. In this very case the ground of forfeiture as declared in the twelfth section of the act of 1874, on which the information is based, consists of certain acts of fraud committed against the public revenue in relation to imported merchandise, which are made criminal by the statute; and it is declared, that the offender shall be fined not exceeding $5,000 nor less than $50, or be imprisoned not exceeding two years, or both; and in addition to such fine such merchandise shall be forfeited. These are the penalties affixed to the criminal acts, the forfeiture sought by this suit being one of them. If an indictment had been presented against the claimants, upon conviction the forfeiture of the goods could have been included in the judgment. If the Government prosecutor elects to waive an indictment, and to file a civil information against the claimants—that is, civil in form—can he by this device take from the proceeding its criminal aspect and deprive the claimants of their immunities as citizens, and extort from them a production of their private papers, or, as an alternative, a confession of guilt? This can not be. The information, though technically a civil proceeding, is in substance and effect a criminal one. As showing the close relation between the civil and criminal proceedings on the same statute in such cases, we may refer to the recent case of Coffey v. The United States, ante, 436; in which we decided that an acquittal on a criminal information was a good plea in bar to a civil information for the forfeiture of goods, arising upon the same acts. As, therefore, suits for penalties and forfeitures incurred by the commission of offenses against the law, are of this quasi criminal nature, we think that they are within the reason of criminal proceedings for all the purposes of the fourth amendment of the Constitution, and of that portion of the fifth amendment which declares that no person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself; and we are further of opinion that a compulsory production of the private books and papers of the owner of goods sought to be forfeited in such a suit is compelling him to be a witness against himself, within the meaning of the fifth amendment to the Constitution, and is equivalent of a search and seizure—and an unreasonable search and seizure—within the meaning of the fourth amendment. Though the proceeding in question is divested of many of the aggravating incidents of actual search and seizure, yet, as before said, it contains their substance and essence, and effects their substantial purpose. It may be that it is the obnoxious thing in its mildest and least repulsive form; but illegitimate and unconstitutional practices get their first footing in that way, namely, by silent approaches and slight deviations from legal modes of procedure. This can only be obviated by adhering to the rule that constitutional provisions for the security of person and property should be liberally construed. A close and literal construction deprives them of half their efficacy, and leads to gradual depreciation of the right, as if it consisted more in sound than in substance. It is the duty of courts to be watchful for the constitutional rights of the citizen, and against any stealthy encroachments thereon. Their motto should be obsta principiis. We have no doubt that the legislative body is actuated by the same motives; but the vast accumulation of public business brought before it sometimes prevents it, on a first presentation, from noticing objections which become developed by time and the practical application of the objectionable law.

There have been several decisions in the circuit and district courts sustaining the constitutionality of the law under consideration, as well as the prior laws of 1863 and 1867. The principal of these are Stockwell v. United States (3 Clifford, 284), In re Platt and Boyd (7 Ben., 261), United States v. Hughes (12 Blatchford, 553), United States v. Mason (6 Bissell, 350), United States v. Three Tons of Coal (6 Bissell, 379), United States v. Distillery No. 28 (6 Bissell, 483). The first and leading case was that of Stockwell v. United States, decided by Mr. Justice Clifford and Judge Shepley, the law under discussion being that of 1867. Justice Clifford delivered the opinion and relied principally upon the collection statutes, which authorized the seizure of goods liable to duty, as being a contemporaneous exposition of the amendments and as furnishing precedents of analogous laws to that complained of. As we have already considered the bearing of these laws on the subject of discussion, it is unnecessary to say anything more in relation to them. The learned justice seemed to think that the power to institute such searches and seizures as the act of 1867 authorized was necessary to the efficient collection of the revenue, and that no greater objection can be taken to a warrant to search for books, invoices, and other papers appertaining to an illegal importation than to one authorizing a search for the imported goods; and he concluded that, guarded as the new provision is, it is scarcely possible that the citizen can have any just ground of complaint. It seems to us that these considerations fail to meet the most serious objections to the validity of the law. The other cases followed that of Stockwell v. United States as a precedent, with more or less independent discussion of the subject. The case of Platt and Boyd, decided in the District Court for the Southern District of New York, was also under the act of 1867, and the opinion in that case is quite an elaborate one; but, of course, the previous decision of the circuit court in the Stockwell case had a governing influence on the district court. The other cases referred to were under the fifth section of the act of 1874. The case of United States v. Hughes came up first before Judge Blatchford in the district court in 1875. (8 Ben., 29.) It was an action of debt to recover a penalty under the customs act, and the judge held that the fifth section of the act of 1874, in its application to suits for penalties incurred before the passage of the act, was an ex post facto law and therefore, as to them, was unconstitutional and void; but he granted an order pro forma to produce the books and papers required, in order that the objection might come up on the offer to give them in evidence. They were produced in obedience to the order and offered in evidence by the district attorney but were not admitted. The district attorney then served upon one of the defendants a subpœna duces tecum, requiring him to produce the books and papers; and, this being declined, he moved for an order to compel him to produce them; but the court refused to make such order. The books and papers referred to had been seized under the act of 1867 but were returned to the defendants under a stipulation to produce them on the trial.

The defendants relied not only on the unconstitutionality of the laws, but on the act of 1868, before referred to, which prohibited evidence obtained from a party by a judicial proceeding from being used against him in any prosecution for a crime, penalty, or forfeiture. Judgment being rendered for the defendant, the case was carried to the circuit court by writ of error, and, in that court, Mr. Justice Hunt held that the act of 1868 referred only to personal testimony or discovery obtained from a party or witness, and not to books or papers wrested from him; and, as to the constitutionality of the law, he merely referred to the case of Stockwell, and the judgment of the district court was reversed. In view of what has been already said, we think it unnecessary to make any special observations on this decision. In United States v. Mason, Judge Blodgett took the distinction that, in proceedings in rem for a forfeiture, the parties are not required by a proceeding under the act of 1874 to testify or furnish evidence against themselves, because the suit is not against them, but against the property. But where the owner of the property has been admitted as a claimant, we can not see the force of this distinction; nor can we assent to the proposition that the proceeding is not, in effect, a proceeding against the owner of the property, as well as against the goods; for it is his breach of the laws which has to be proved to establish the forfeiture, and it is his property which is sought to be forfeited; and to require such an owner to produce his private books and papers, in order to prove his breach of the laws, and thus to establish the forfeiture of his property, is surely compelling him to furnish evidence against himself. In the words of a great judge, "Goods, as goods, can not offend, forfeit, unlade, pay duties, or the like, but men whose goods they are." (Note by the court.—Vaughan, C. J., in Sheppard v. Gosnold, Vaugh., 159, 172, approved by Ch. Baron Parker in Mitchell qui tam v. Torup, Parker, 227, 236.)

The only remaining case decided in the United States courts to which we shall advert is that of United States v. Distillery No. 28. In that case Judge Gresham adds to the view of Judge Blodgett, in United States v. Mason, the further suggestion, that as in a proceeding in rem the owner is not a party, he might be compelled by a subpœna duces tecum to produce his books and papers like any other witness; and that the warrant or notice for search and seizure, under the act of 1874, does nothing more. But we can not say that we are any better satisfied with this supposed solution of the difficulty. The assumption that the owner may be cited as a witness in a proceeding to forfeit his property seems to us gratuitous. It begs the question at issue. A witness, as well as a party, is protected by the law from being compelled to give evidence that tends to criminate him, or to subject his property to forfeiture. (Queen v. Newell, Parker, 269; 1 Greenleaf on Evid., secs. 451–453.) But, as before said, although the owner of goods, sought to be forfeited by a proceeding in rem, is not the nominal party, he is nevertheless the substantial party to the suit; he certainly is so, after making claim and defense; and, in a case like the present, he is entitled to all the privileges which appertain to a person who is prosecuted for a forfeiture of his property by reason of committing a criminal offense.

We find nothing in the decisions to change our views in relation to the principal question at issue.

We think that the notice to produce the invoice in this case, the order by virtue of which it was issued, and the law which authorized the order, were unconstitutional and void, and that the inspection by the district attorney of said invoice, when produced in obedience to said notice, and its admission in evidence by the court, were erroneous and unconstitutional proceedings. We are of opinion, therefore, that the judgment of the circuit court should be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to award a new trial.

Mr. Justice Miller, with whom was the Chief Justice, concurring:

I concur in the judgment of the court, reversing that of the circuit court, and in so much of the opinion of this court as holds the fifth section of the act of 1874 void as applicable to the present case.

I am of opinion that this is a criminal case within the meaning of that clause of the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States which declares that no person "shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself."

And I am quite satisfied that the effect of the act of Congress is to compel the party on whom the order of the court is served to be a witness against himself. The order of the court under the statute is in effect a subpœna duces tecum, and, though the penalty for the witness's failure to appear in court with the criminating papers is not fine and imprisonment, it is one which may be made more severe, namely, to have charges against him of a criminal nature, taken for confessed, and made the foundation of the judgment of the court. That this is within the protection which the Constitution intended against compelling a person to be a witness against himself, is, I think, quite clear.

But this being so, there is no reason why this court should assume that the action of the court below, in requiring a party to produce certain papers as evidence on the trial, authorizes an unreasonable search or seizure of the house, papers, or effects of that party.

There is in fact no search and no seizure authorized by the statute. No order can be made by the court under it which requires or permits anything more than service of notice on a party to the suit. That there may be no mistake as to the effect of the statute and the power to be exercised under it, I give the section here verbatim:

"SEC. 5. That in all suits and proceedings other than criminal arising under any of the revenue laws of the United States, the attorney representing the Government, whenever, in his belief, any business book, invoice, or paper, belonging to or under the control of the defendant or claimant, will tend to prove any allegation made by the United States, may make a written motion, particularly describing such book, invoice, or paper, and setting forth the allegation which he expects to prove; and thereupon the court in which suit or proceeding is pending may, at its discretion, issue a notice to the defendant or claimant to produce such book, invoice, or paper, in court, at a day and hour to be specified in said notice, which, together with a copy of said motion, shall be served formally on the defendant or claimant, by the United States marshal, by delivering to him a certified copy thereof, or otherwise serving the same as original notices of suit in the same court are served; and if the defendant or claimant shall fail or refuse to produce such book, invoice, or paper in obedience to such notice, the allegations stated in the said motion shall be taken as confessed, unless his failure or refusal to produce the same shall be explained to the satisfaction of the court. And if produced, the said attorney shall be permitted, under the direction of the court, to make examination (at which examination the defendant or claimant, or his agent, may be present) of such entries in said book, invoice, or paper as relate to or tend to prove the allegation aforesaid, and may offer the same in evidence on behalf of the United States. But the owner of said books and papers, his agent or attorney, shall have, subject to the order of the court, the custody of them, except pending their examination in court as aforesaid." (18 Stat., 187.)

Nothing in the nature of a search is here hinted at. Nor is there any seizure, because the party is not required at any time to part with the custody of the papers. They are to be produced in court, and, when produced, the United States attorney is permitted, under the direction of the court, to make examination in presence of the claimant, and may offer in evidence such entries in the books, invoices, or papers as relate to the issue. The act is careful to say that "the owner of said books and papers, his agent or attorney, shall have, subject to the order of the court, the custody of them, except pending their examination in court as aforesaid."

The fourth amendment says: "The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated, and no warrant shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched and the person or thing to be seized."

The things here forbidden are two—search and seizure. And not all searches nor all seizures are forbidden, but only those that are unreasonable. Reasonable searches, therefore, may be allowed, and if the thing sought be found, it may be seized.

But what search does this statute authorize? If the mere service of a notice to produce a paper to be used as evidence, which the party can obey or not as he chooses, is a search, then a change has taken place in the meaning of words, which has not come within my reading, and which I think was unknown at the time the Constitution was made. The searches meant by the Constitution were such as led to seizure when the search was successful. But the statute in this case uses language carefully framed to forbid any seizure under it, as I have already pointed out.

While the framers of the Constitution had their attention drawn no doubt to the abuses of this power of searching private houses and seizing private papers, as practiced in England, it is obvious that they only intended to restrain the abuse, while they did not abolish the power. Hence it is only unreasonable searches and seizures that are forbidden, and the means of securing this protection was by abolishing searches under warrants, which were called general warrants, because they authorized searches in any place for any thing.

This was forbidden, while searches founded on affidavits and made under warrants which described the thing to be searched for, the person and place to be searched, are still permitted.

I can not conceive how a statute aptly framed to require the production of evidence in a suit by mere service of notice on the party who has that evidence in his possession can be held to authorize an unreasonable search or seizure, when no seizure is authorized or permitted by the statute.

I am requested to say that the Chief Justice concurs in this opinion.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I desire to call up for consideration the conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill

(H. R. 14) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes, with a view to its disposition at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEW in the chair). Without objection, the Chair lays before the Senate the conference report referred to by the Senator from Oregon.

The Senate proceeded to consider the conference report, which appears in yesterday's proceedings.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I shall not ask that the conference report be agreed to until I suggest the absence of a quorum, for the reason that a number of Senators who are absent may desire to be present, and they may not know that the conference report has been taken up. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Husting	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.
Brady	Johnson, Cal.	New	Smith, Md.
Brandegee	Jones, N. Mex.	Norris	Smoot
Calder	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Sterling
Chamberlain	Kellogg	Page	Sutherland
Culberson	Kendrick	Phelan	Swanson
Fernald	King	Pomerene	Thompson
Fletcher	Knox	Ransdell	Townsend
France	La Follette	Robinson	Wadsworth
Gerry	Lewis	Saulsbury	Walsh
Gronna	McCumber	Shafroth	Warren
Hale	McKellar	Sheppard	Watson
Harding	Martin	Sherman	Weeks

Mr. MCKELLAR. I desire to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], is absent on official business. He has a general pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE]. I will ask that this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Michigan] and his general pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. I will ask that this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] is unavoidably absent on business of the Senate.

Mr. LEWIS. May I be permitted to announce, for the day, the absence of the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], caused by illness? He has a general pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF].

In this connection may I also be permitted to announce the absence of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] and of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD], who have been called out on official business of the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-two Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. NELSON. What is the question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On agreeing to the report of the committee of conference on House bill No. 14, being the Military Academy appropriation bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say, for the information of the Senate, that we have taken up for consideration the conference report on the Military Academy appropriation bill.

Mr. NELSON. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

ARMY APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to House bill 13, being the Army appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes.

The Secretary read the report, which was printed in the RECORD of the proceedings of Friday, May 4.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, while there appear to be a great many changes in the bill, I desire to say that there are no radical changes in the bill as it passed the Senate. The amount of the appropriations carried by the bill has been reduced by $8,129,722.17. Reductions were made in many instances, and in other instances the provisions which the House bill contained were restored, because the conferees thought that a bill which has passed the House and which is now pending in the Appropriations Committee of the Senate provides ample appropriations to cover the amounts by which we have reduced appropriations. Therefore, many of the changes refer to these reductions in amount. If there are any particular amendments to which Senators desire to direct my attention, I will be very glad, so far as I can, to explain them.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator what reason can be given for requiring the Senate to recede from amendment numbered 119, on pages 87, 88, 89, and 90 of the bill? The Senate amended the provision of the House bill by making a few changes in it, perfecting it, and making, I think, a very great improvement on the House bill. I should like to inquire why the Senate conferees could not retain that amendment, and why the House insisted upon the Senate receding?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the House conferees were very insistent upon the provision of the House bill, which is more nearly in accord than was the provision of the Senate bill with the law as it was passed last year making appropriations for rifle ranges for civilian instruction. In addition to that, Mr. President, the conferees thought, in view of the fact that under the bill for increasing the Army larger opportunities will be given for target practice in the army to be organized, that it was not best at this time to enlarge the functions of the National Board for Promotion of Rifle Practice, but to leave it rather to the army that is to be organized under the bill which is now in conference. The House conferees were insistent upon the House provision, and there was much force in the suggestions which they made. The Senate conferees receded from the Senate amendment with some reluctance, after trying as hard as they could to get the House conferees to yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I will say that, of course, the conditions are somewhat changed from what they were a year ago; but they have not changed in a way that would make less desirable this encouragement of civilian markmanship. There is just as much need, and even greater, while we are in war than there was before, that those of our people who are capable of bearing arms should know how to shoot. It is useless to give a man a gun and a quantity of ammunition and send him out if he can not hit a barn 200 yards away. This provision in the bill, it seems to me, is very important.

At the State camp in Florida they have the equipment, the targets, and the range; the Government owns some 700 acres of land there; and it is an ideal place for this kind of practice, which ought to be kept up. The Regular Army is not excluded from it at all. It is open to all—Regulars, National Guard, schools, colleges, universities, and rifle clubs all over the country. This thing of teaching how to shoot is a very important part of military preparation. Bernard Shaw in his article, rather of a facetious title and perhaps ambiguous, "Joy riding at the front," giving his observations on the battle fields of France, says the most effective work being done is by the men who can shoot straight. That is an important thing, and we ought not to lose sight of it.

The provision of the House bill for $60,000 to transport men to the rifle ranges is wholly inadequate, and it was for the purpose of taking care of that situation that the Senate amendment was offered.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator that in connection with the urgent deficiency bill, now before the Appropriations Committee, there was recommended this morning an appropriation of $344,000 for the same purpose. That will be in addition to the amount provided for in this bill. There is no limitation as to the amount that shall be expended for the transportation of the men or any other limitation.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am very glad to hear the Senator mention that. I was not aware of that pending matter. That, however, I am afraid will not accomplish what is aimed at here, because I fear it will not be spent for this purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. As to that, of course, Mr. President, I can not say; but I know that the Secretary of War will have it in his power to expend the amount for that purpose if he so desires.

Mr. FLETCHER. That, of course, will be helpful.

Mr. SMOOT. In connection with the reductions that have been made in the bill, I desire to say that they have all been added in the urgent deficiency bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think it is a great mistake to recede from the amendment; but, of course, I do not want to cause any trouble about the whole bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, it would not be in order to act on any particular amendment to this bill. The report of the conferees must be either adopted or rejected as a whole.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee—I have not been able to examine the conference report carefully—what was done with Senate amendment No. 73 with reference to military roads in Alaska?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The amount was placed at $500,000, and was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I also desire to ask the Senator with reference to Senate amendment No. 76, relating to the Vancouver rifle range?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That was agreed to as it was in the Senate bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 291. An act to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and, on motion of Mr. OVERMAN, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PUNISHMENT OF ESPIONAGE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2) to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee, on page 33, inserting section 1.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, when the vote was taken the other day on the motion to strike out the section of this bill which would limit the publication of war news by the newspapers of the country I voted for it, and regret that the motion was not carried; but I know that another opportunity will be afforded when the bill is reported in the Senate, and I shall at that time again vote to strike out the provision referred to.

Mr. President, I do not think it can be maintained that the Members of either the Senate or the House of Representatives have failed during the present session to stand by the President. We have voted for a declaration of war, almost unanimously; we have voted unanimously to permit the President to issue $7,000,000,000 worth of bonds and other securities; we voted almost unanimously to authorize him to raise an army by selective draft; and many of the Senators voted for this simply because the President asked for it.

The claim made in this Chamber that the President is favorable to this particular provision in the bill under consideration is not sufficient reason to warrant my voting for it; but this is not an evidence that I do not contemplate voting to give all the men and money needed to carry this war to a successful conclusion.

I am not ready, Mr. President, to prevent the great independent press of this country from printing all the news of the day. I believe that they can be trusted not to publish anything that would be of aid or comfort to the enemy. In every war this Nation has ever been engaged in, one of its greatest pillars of strength has been the support of the press. Have those in charge of this bill any idea that Congress would have acted with such unanimity during the past few weeks if the President did not have a united press behind him; do they believe that in the days to come we can hope to succeed in this conflict unless the press of the country stands strongly behind the Government?

It is a matter of common knowledge that but for the exposure by the English press of the inefficiency of those in charge of the British Government in the early days of the war, conditions might have continued there which would have led to ultimate defeat. Lord Northcliffe, in his newspapers, laid before the public the true conditions; and the pressure of public opinion became so great as to make necessary the complete reorganization of the Government, and the placing in charge of it of men equipped to handle its affairs. I hope that our newspapers will not be called upon to perform that service for the people of the United States; but I am not willing that any law should be enacted which would prevent spreading broadcast throughout the Nation the news, if such there be, that our Government is being inefficiently conducted.

At a dinner given to him by his old friends in Brooklyn recently Pomeroy Burton, editor of the London Times, in referring to the matter of censorship, said:

The Government needs publicity, the armies need it, the navies need it, the whole war machinery from start to finish needs it in the widest possible sense. There must be absolute freedom to discuss, argue, criticize, oppose, and suggest.

Senators have insisted that this is a war measure, and any such measure which, in my judgment, is necessary will have my whole-hearted support; but I do not believe this to be necessary or expedient, and I am not willing, because of the indiscretion of one or two newspapers, that the rest should be stifled. The administration will need the friendship and cooperation of America's great journals. Their support will be freely given, and I know that the stronger ones will criticize, if criticism is necessary, even if we should enact the legislation now under consideration. But the less powerful ones would be deterred from printing what they really believed it was advisable for the people to know.

I have here, Mr. President, a letter sent to me by the editors of three Brooklyn newspapers, the Brooklyn Eagle, the Standard Union, and the Brooklyn Times. These three great patriotic journals have been ardent supporters of the Government in these critical days, and no one of them has made an unfriendly statement. I am pleased to read into the RECORD their views on this important matter:

HON. WILLIAM M. CALDER,
Washington, D. C.:

The Brooklyn newspapers take this opportunity to urge upon the Brooklyn Members of the Congress the necessity for checking hasty and unintelligent legislation which seeks to place the press of the United States under the control of a drastic censorship. The Brooklyn newspapers, like newspapers elsewhere, have loyally cooperated with the Government in suppressing news and restraining comment which in the expressed opinion of the Government might have given aid to the enemy and caused embarrassment in Washington. The Brooklyn newspapers recognize that it may be imperative to substitute for that voluntary censorship a system established by congressional enactment; but they insist that such a system be not constructed upon the model of the British and French censorships which have kept from the people of Great Britain and France vital facts regarding the war. News concerning the movement of troops and warships, news that might to any marked degree assist the enemy, may properly be excluded by law from publication. But the Government should help and not obstruct the newspapers in the publication of the truth concerning all war losses and all conditions which, when fully known, would arouse the people of the country to the magnitude of the task before them. The newspapers do not wish their readers to live in any fool's paradise of misapprehension or ignorance.

By JOHN A. HALTON, Editor.

MAY 2, 1917.

I also have here copy of resolutions unanimously adopted by the American Newspaper Publishers' Association in New York City, on Wednesday, April 25, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD with my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The following resolutions, offered by Louis Wiley, business manager of the New York Times, and seconded by Charles H. Taylor, jr., publisher of the Boston Globe, were unanimously adopted at the convention of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association at the Waldorf-Astoria, Wednesday afternoon, April 25:

"The American Newspaper Publishers' Association, representing the daily newspapers, requests Congress to eliminate the press-censorship provision from the espionage bill now pending.

"The proposed legislation strikes at the fundamental rights of the people, not only assailing their freedom of speech but also seeking to deprive them of the means of forming intelligent opinion. It is drastic, yet vague, in its terms, providing the severest penalties for acts the criminal quality of which is to be defined hereafter under a delegated authority. Its possible consequences in restricting the liberty of the press are full of peril to free institutions.

"The censorship proposed is believed to be a violation of the Constitution of the United States, which prohibits Congress from 'abridging the freedom of speech or of the press.' An effort to suspend this constitutional guaranty, whether ultimately sustained or not, is sure to be followed by grave injury to the rights of the people, whose one great safeguard in time of war is an untrammeled press.

"A voluntary censorship, suggested by the Government, is being carefully observed by the newspapers of the United States, and no loyal newspaper will knowingly print that which would give aid to the enemy. Any newspaper that willfully publishes information of military value to the enemy can, and should be, prosecuted under the law of treason.

"Established means of communication, carrying messages ordinarily regarded as private, will be used by an enemy for the transmission of information, and every proper purpose of the proposed legislation would be served by the control of outgoing messages by mail, telegraph, cable, etc., and by search of the effects of persons traveling from the United States to foreign countries.

"In war especially the press should be free, vigilant, and unfettered. The American people are entitled to a full and frank statement of all that occurs, whether it be good or bad. There can be no justification for a restriction that abridges the liberty of the press, for the people must have confidence that they are getting the truth.

"The defeat of this objectionable legislation, therefore, is most earnestly urged upon Congress."

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I have no doubt but that before this measure is finally enacted it will be modified so as not to stifle the great independent press of the country. To prevent the publication of information which the public should know would, I sincerely believe, be a grievous mistake.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I was just going to suggest the absence of a quorum before the amendment is voted on.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. I think it ought to be done. There are about four Senators present on the other side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Harding	Myers	Sherman
Brady	Johnson, Cal.	Nelson	Simmons
Brandegee	Jones, N. Mex.	New	Smith, Ga.
Calder	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Smith, Md.
Chamberlain	Kellogg	Overman	Smoot
Colt	Kendrick	Page	Thomas
Culberson	Kenyon	Pittman	Thompson
Cummins	King	Pomerene	Underwood
Curtis	Kirby	Ransdell	Wadsworth
Dillingham	Knox	Saulsbury	Walsh
Fletcher	McCumber	Shafroth	Warren
France	McKellar	Sheppard

Mr. PITTMAN. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] is detained on official business.

Mr. McKELLAR. My colleague [Mr. SHIELDS] is absent on public business, and is paired, I believe, with the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE].

Mr. THOMPSON. I wish to announce that the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] and the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] are absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-seven Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. GORE, Mr. MARTIN, and Mr. STONE answered to their names when called.

Mr. ASHURST and Mr. GRONNA entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-two Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, just before the call for a quorum was made I understood the Chair to state that the question was on the amendment of the committee. Am I right?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, when the absence of a quorum was suggested there were three members of the majority in the Senate Chamber. I assume that that means that all of those who were absent are satisfied as to what their votes shall be upon the amendment. Therefore I am not at all criticizing their absence, but I assume that they have heard all the argument that they desire and are ready to vote, and, of course, ready to support the committee's report.

I should like to have the chairman of the committee state to me why it is necessary that so drastic a measure as is contained in section 1 should be made the law, not during the war but at all times? Why is it necessary to have this new legislation, broadening to a very great degree the reasons for the issuance of these writs, apply in years when we are at peace?

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, there have been brought to the attention of the committee serious conditions that have arisen since the war. I want to say to the Senator that if he has read the report of the Attorney General—which I will have read when he gets through—he has no doubt seen what the Attorney General says, calling the attention of Congress before the war to the importance of having a search-warrant law. The truth of it is, we have nothing in the laws of this country in regard to search warrants except with regard to customs, counterfeiting, blockading, whisky, and smuggling.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does that mean before this war began, or before we entered into this war?

Mr. OVERMAN. Before we entered into this war.

Mr. McCUMBER. But the war was going on?

Mr. OVERMAN. Oh, no; I refer to the Attorney General's annual report, sent to Congress last November, I think.

Mr. McCUMBER. I mean, the war itself—not our war, but the present European war—was going on?

Mr. OVERMAN. It was not with reference to this war, especially. Of course very serious conditions have occurred, showing the necessity of it, since the war began; but when the Senator gets through I should like to read what the Attorney General says in regard to the necessity for this legislation in his annual report made in November, 1916.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will allow me, I desire to state that great misapprehension exists as to the object and purpose of this law, and why it is desired.

Within the last six months—I can not recall the exact date—police officers in New York invaded the quarters of Von Engel, a representative of the German Government, who was cooperating with Boy-Ed and Von Papen in carrying on in this country a system of espionage. They seized a lot of valuable papers. They were brought here to Washington, and I understand the contention was made by the German ambassador that they were official papers and that our Government had no right to seize them. There was a large lot of papers. Finally, as I understand—and I get my information from the newspapers—our Government suggested to the German ambassador that he could come and look over the papers and select those that were official papers. He declined to avail himself of that opportunity, because that would have been a clear give-away.

Now, those papers were most important and valuable. They explained the entire ramifications of the spy system that had been carried on in this country under German auspices since the war began. It was a perfectly lawless act to go in there and take those papers at the time and place and under the circumstances. The Government feels, and it seems to me, that seizures of that kind ought to be permitted by law.

I want further to say—and I do not want to argue the case—that we have no general Federal law in reference to search warrants, as they have in most of the States. We have only laws permitting search in a few special cases. One is internal-revenue cases; another is customs cases; a third is counterfeiting cases; a fourth is smuggling liquor into Indian reservations and offenses connected with the liquor traffic. Possibly there may be others, but those are the only ones I can recall at this moment. The object of this is to have a general law for the Federal Government where an offense has been committed, a violation of the laws of the United States, treaties of the United States, or the obligations and rights and duties of the United States under the law of nations.

As the bill originally came to the committee it contained a provision defining these offenses. The argument was made before the committee that you could not seize any papers unless there was a crime committed or about to be committed. So to meet that idea section 7 was incorporated in the bill, and I ask Senators to read that section in connection with section 1, because the seizures contemplated by section 1 are seizures of property and papers that are made criminal under section 7.

I believe we ought to have a general law on the subject. The criticism was made that it included the rights and duties of our Government under the law of nations. I can conceive of many cases where a man may violate the obligations and duties of our country under the law of nations; but if Senators think that phrase should be omitted, certainly it ought to cover cases of violations of laws of the United States and the treaties of the United States. There can not be any doubt about that.

This is all I desire to say. I have simply explained the purpose of the law. It is to fill a vacuum that exists in our legislation. As I said, we have no general search-warrant law. It is limited to the four cases I have mentioned. Perhaps I may have omitted some, but I can not at this moment recall any others; and this is to give us a general law covering criminal cases of this kind.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if it stopped there it might be well, but it does not; it covers every case of every kind of a law, civil and criminal, that has been enacted by the Congress of the United States. It covers the entire field of congressional legislation upon every possible subject.

It is admitted that this is a war measure, and I will readily vote for any legislation that is necessary to apply the search warrant to any possible thing that affects our war relations. I am not, however, prepared to vote to extend the search warrant into every possible avenue or line of business or trade that is covered by a law of the United States.

I want the authorities to have the power to issue and to serve a search warrant and to ascertain whether or not there is any propaganda that is attempting to forestall or prevent the application of the draft system, for instance, or that in any way attempts to check our forces and our prowess in this great war in which we are now entering. But, Mr. President, I think it ought to be limited to this war, and then we can, when we have time, prepare and enact any legislation that would apply to other matters.

There are two things that I think ought to be out of this provision. One is that which relates to the violation of any law of the United States, and the other is that which relates to the law of nations, which law is extremely broad and very little understood, and is changing from day to day and from month to month and year to year without any legislation upon the subject.

Mr. President, suppose we would state that this law should apply during the continuance of this war, and then simply cut out that portion relating to the violation of any law and that relating to the violation of the law of nations, leaving in that violating our treaty obligations, and then substitute it with something like this:

That during the continuance of the present war a search warrant may be issued in conformity with the provisions of this act for the purpose of searching any premises or person to discover any property or papers held, secured, used, or intended to be held, secured, or used in violation of or in aid of a violation of any law of the United States.

Now, what law? So far I have copied the measure itself:

Any law of the United States relating to the raising or supplying of the military or naval forces of the United States or any other law relating to the conduct of said war or to the treaty obligations of the United States.

That would cover everything the Senators supporting this measure have argued in favor of. It is broad enough to cover everything pertaining to this war and at the same time is narrowed down to those things that are of vital interest to us in the conduct of the war, and it ought not to go any further at this time.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield with pleasure, Mr. President.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think there ought to be a general statute of a Federal character something like the statutes of the States providing for search warrants when a public offense has been committed or is about to be committed?

If the Senator will pardon me, I will propound another question while I am on the floor. Does not the Senator think the amendment which he has suggested is rather too narrow, because it would not give the Government authority to invoke the benefit or aid of a search warrant in cases which are now infractions of the criminal statutes of the United States?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; Mr. President, it is as broad as the law now is. It allows the use of these instruments for the enforcement of the law wherever they can be allowed to-day; and in addition it covers everything pertaining to the war. I think before we enact a general statute covering every law that has been or may be passed by the United States we ought to give that special consideration, and we can not do it and we are not doing it in the consideration of this bill. I am not prepared to say that there should be a search warrant of the character mentioned herein which could be applied to the violation of every law that has been passed by the Congress of the United States. I think we should consider that as a separate matter. What we are dealing with now is the war situation, and if we enact legislation that deals with this war legislation we may well relegate all other matters to a time in which we can consider them as separate propositions.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator pardon another question?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator see any reason why we should not have a statute something like that which obtains in most of the States? The statutes of the States usually provide that a search warrant may be issued, among other reasons, "when the property was stolen or embezzled," or "when it was used as the means of committing a felony," or "when it is in the possession of any person with the intent to use it as the means of committing a public offense." Why should there not be a general statute enacted by the Federal Government which may be invoked in cases where a public offense has been or is about to be committed under the same circumstances and to the same extent as a similar statute is invoked in the States?

Mr. McCUMBER. I am inclined to think there should be. I would not want to pass absolute judgment upon that question at this particular time; but I call the Senator's attention to the fact that this proposed measure is so broad that it covers civil law, criminal law, and international law—law of every character.

Mr. KING. I wish to say to the Senator that the criticism which he made against some features of the first section appeal to me very strongly, and I will agree to a part of his amendment, speaking for myself; but I do not think the amendment of the Senator is broad enough. There ought to be a statute sufficiently broad to permit the United States to invoke a statute something like that which prevails in the various States.

Mr. McCUMBER. We might well take our time in the consideration of that general law. What we need now is a law that will meet the war situation; the amendment which I propose as a substitute does meet that, and that I think is all that we should consider to-day.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRADY. May I ask the Senator from North Dakota at what place in the bill he would have the amendment he suggests inserted?

Mr. McCUMBER. I substitute it for the entire section 1. I have recopied almost all of section 1.

Mr. BRADY. That would then limit the entire bill to the war?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; it would limit the issuance of these writs to the cases now provided by law and all the other cases relating to war conditions.

Mr. BRADY. Only as it applies to section 1?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. I understood the Senator to make the objection to the first section that the violation of the law of nations is a pretty broad order; that the law of nations is rather indeterminate, especially at this time, and mostly it is only what the most powerful nation says it is. But I do not read the section in that way. I do not think it is subject to that objection. It is not where the law of nations is violated, but where the rights and obligations of the United States under the law of nations are violated.

I think there is quite a distinction between searching a house or papers for a violation of the law of nations and doing it for the purpose of seeing whether the rights and obligations of the United States are being impaired or interfered with under the law of nations. I think perhaps there is no more sacred right than the right and obligation the Government of the United States has under the law of nations, and no more serious offense could be committed than an offense in violation of those rights and obligations.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think that is subject to the same objection, because the obligation of the United States of the law of nations is about as indefinite and indeterminate as one could possibly conceive. What is the law of nations relative to the particular right? That is a question which must be decided by the courts or by some one else. Where are you going to get the information upon which you may decide that? From the writers upon international law, who determine according to their judgment what the custom of nations has been upon the particular phase of international law discussed.

Mr. KNOX. May I again ask a question?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. I think I was unfortunate in not making myself clear. Let me read section 1:

A search warrant may be issued in conformity with the provisions of this act for the purpose of searching any premises or person to discover any property or papers held, secured, or used, or intended to be held, secured, or used, in violation of or in aid of a violation of any law of the United States, or of a treaty of the United States, or of the rights or obligations of the United States under the law of nations.

It is wholly immaterial, as it would be wholly impossible, under this section to secure a search warrant against a man who was charged with violating the law of nations unless you would put in the information "violating the rights or the obligations of the United States under the law of nations." We know the functions of our Government. We know it is the function of our Government to know and assert what our rights are under the law of nations. It is the function of the Government to know and to perform our obligations under the law of nations. It seems to me if there is any class of offenders who ought to be reached it is those who have writings, papers, property, or anything else that would interfere with the United States in asserting its rights and fulfilling its obligations under the law of nations.

Mr. McCUMBER. I agree that it is the function of the United States Government to determine what its obligations are under the law of nations, but I can not conceive that we could provide that the individual should always be held responsible, because we can not guess what the decision of the Government will be in reference to its obligations or duties under the law of nations; and that is the objection which I am trying to urge.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. In just one moment. Let me call attention to the fact that my proposed amendment does provide for reaching a case—

In violation of or in aid of a violation of any law of the United States relating to the raising and supplying of the military or naval forces of the United States or of any treaty obligation of the United States or any other law relating to the conduct of said war.

We can all tell what the treaty obligations are because they are written law, and we will take our chances whether we violate them or not. Very few have even a meager understanding of what international law is, and therefore less understanding as to what our obligations under international law would be in any given case.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. By the courtesy of the Senator from North Dakota I should like to ask a question of the Senator from Pennsylvania to see if I understand clearly his position.

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield, Mr. President.

Mr. CUMMINS. Recently when some of our ships sought to enter the neutral ports of Norway, Denmark, and Sweden they were interrupted, arrested by British ships, turned back, and taken into the proper port and committed to the care of a prize court. We asserted that under the law of nations we had a right to enter those ports. Great Britain asserted that under the law of nations we had not the right to enter them. My question is this: If a citizen of the United States, through any instrumentality that he might possess, was endeavoring to convince the world the we had no right to enter those neutral ports under those conditions, would he have been guilty of a crime and would he and his possessions have been subject to a search warrant?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KNOX. I do not think it necessarily follows that anyone is guilty of a crime who has in his possession any of the documents which are described in the first section. It is the purpose of the search to find whether or not these documents so held do violate the laws or treaties of the United States or the rights and obligations of the United States under the law of nations.

I should say in the case the Senator from Iowa cites that if the United States authority as provided for in the second subdivision of this chapter would go before a United States judge or a United States commissioner, he would have to make out a case very different from the case put by the Senator from Iowa. He would have to show not only that the papers or documents that were sought to be obtained by the search warwant had reference to rights or obligations of the United States, but that they were intended to be used in violation of those rights or obligations. The question put by the Senator from Iowa, it seems to me, would only indicate that they would have reference to that situation.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania be a little more specific and say what, in his judgment, would be a violation of the right of the United States in the case I put?

Mr. KNOX. It seems to me that that is rather a wide question to ask one who has simply risen to call attention to the distinction between the violation of the law of nations and the violation of the rights and obligations of the United States under the law of nations. I can not call to my mind just at this moment what might be a case, but I have no doubt after a half hour's reflection I could bring to your attention half a dozen cases where the rights and obligations of the United States were involved either in a controversy with a foreign country or arose in some other way where those rights and obligations could be most seriously interfered with by a private citizen.

There is a statute of the United States, upon the books today and has been for almost a hundred years, making it a criminal offense to hold correspondence with a foreign Government or citizens of a foreign Government in relation to pending diplomatic affairs between the United States in such a way as might interfere with not only the right and the duty of the United States, but might interfere with the orderly progress and successful eventuation of matters that were in contemplation or under consideration.

So this section of the bill does not stagger me one particle. I do not feel that I must tremble for my individual right under this section of the bill. I think no citizen of the United States has any cause to complain if his house is searched or his person is searched simply for the purpose of seeing whether he has in his possession documents or property or other things that might tend or were intended, as this bill says, to be used in violation of the rights of his country, whether the violation pertains to the enforcement of its statutes, the enforcement of its treaties, or the enforcement of its duties under the broader law that prevails between the civilized nations of the world.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, here are two very learned attorneys who differ radically upon this simple little proposition. While it would not stagger the Senator from Pennsylvania to be brought up against a proposition of this kind, it might stagger the ordinary individual who is not a lawyer at all when his person and his property are seized and his home is violated in carrying out a provision under this bill. I wish to call the Senator's attention again to the proposition that it is not only the violation or proposed violation of a criminal statute for which this search warrant will be issued, it is the violation of any law of the United States—civil or criminal.

Mr. KELLOGG. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. KELLOGG. Do you think a violation of the rights and obligations of the United States under international law to be more indefinite than the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] to make the receiving or asking of anything more than a reasonable profit a criminal offense?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I am not discussing that now. I might say that I would not, but the Senator from Iowa must answer the question of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. President, I do not wish to delay any vote on this proposition, but I want to say as earnestly and as emphatically as I can that the proposed substitute does cover every question which might possibly arise that would affect the interest of this country during the continuance of this war, and that it does eliminate and only eliminates that debatable and questionable ground as to whether the law should apply in such and such cases or should apply to the general laws of the United States; and as this, I repeat, is a bill which seeks to deal with only a war situation, its terms ought to be limited to the necessities of that situation.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I think I might help the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] by referring to the genesis of this bill. It is an error to suppose that this feature of the bill originated by reason of the war contingency either before or after we entered into the contest. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] is usually accurate in his statement of the law, but I think he is in error in the statement that the present law authorizes the issuance of search warrants to seize intoxicating liquors about to be taken into Indian territory. The want of a statute of that character gave rise originally to the discussion of this search-warrant question. A bill was introduced by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] which authorized the issuance of search warrants to search for and seize liquor within or about to be taken within that portion of the State of Oklahoma which is still regarded as Indian country so far as the enforcement of the intoxicating-liquor statute is concerned, and the question of the framing of an adequate search-warrant statute thus came under consideration by the Judiciary Committee and by the Department of Justice.

While the matter was pending in that shape the necessity for a search-warrant statute in connection with the troubles in Mexico presented itself. It was not an uncommon practice when it was made an offense to introduce arms into the Republic of Mexico, pursuant to a proclamation issued by the President under a statute, for the officers of the United States, military and otherwise, to seize arms that were intended to go into Mexico in violation of the statute and the proclamation, and when they could be found they were seized. But information often came to the officers that accumulations of arms of that kind were being made with intent to take them into Mexico in violation of the statute and the necessity for a search-warrant statute to meet conditions of that character presented itself.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. I am inclined to think the Senator from Montana is right and that I was mistaken in the broad statement as to Indian reservations. I was led to make that statement from the fact that in the State of Minnesota the supreme court has decided under the provisions of an old Indian treaty that certain territory the Indians ceded long ago is what we call commonly dry territory, and under the provisions of that treaty and that decision the Government officials have been seizing all liquor found in that country. That is what led me to make the statement. I am inclined to think that I was mistaken and that in its full extent the Senator from Montana is correct.

Mr. WALSH. I thank the Senator for the statement, and knowing how accurate he usually is, I went to the compilation of statutes to confirm my recollection about the matter, and I found there was not a general statute authorizing generally the seizure of liquors that were about to be introduced within the Indian country. So, Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota is in error in assuming that this feature of the bill is intended to take care only of conditions furnished by the war. It was intended to cover the general subject of search warrants.

Mr. President, there is a very great necessity for a statute of this character, because there are many places within the country within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Federal courts; for instance, Indian reservations, and reservations of many kinds. Crimes committed within that territory are punishable under the Federal law and not under the State law; larceny, for instance, committed within territory of that character—that is, within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Federal courts. No provision is made by the law for the issuance of a search warrant even for the purpose of securing stolen goods within that territory. It is solely within the jurisdiction of the Federal courts. So the statute should be made to cover the subject generally as well as to meet the conditions that are peculiar in their nature by reason of the state of war which now prevails.

There is one suggestion, Mr. President, which has been made by the Senator from North Dakota which to me seems very forcible and which I think might well be accepted. It is true that the statute reads generally that a search warrant is authorized in case of the violation of any law of the United States. That would, of course, include a violation of a civil statute as well as of a penal statute. When it comes to the violation of a statute I think it might well be confined to violations of penal statutes, and I would suggest the incorporation of the word "penal" before the word "statute." With that amendment, Mr. President, I do not believe that any just criticism can be lodged against this provision of the bill.

I quite agree with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] that the liberties of the citizen are by no means imperiled when a search warrant, under the restrictions and the safeguards provided by this bill, is issued for the purpose of searching the premises of a person for the purpose of finding thereon property which, it is asserted, has been used or is about to be used in violation of the law of nations or the rights or obligations of the United States under the law of nations. Mr. President, that is the feature of immediate consequence. We had the matter under consideration, as I suggested, in connection with the situation in Oklahoma, to which I have referred, and in connection with conditions which arose by reason of the troubles in Mexico, and now upon the prospect of war with Germany; and the necessity became apparent for the issuance of a search warrant in the case of threatened violations of the law of nations involving the rights or obligations of the United States.

It is true, Mr. President, that there is more or less doubt—indeed, we might say more, rather than less, doubt—about what is the law of nations; and yet the Supreme Court of the United States ever since it came into existence has interpreted and enforced the law of nations. It has declared that the international law is thus and so, and has adjudicated rights to private property upon the rules of international law as they were by that court laid down. International law is not expressed in a code, it is true, and oftentimes it is difficult to determine just what the law of nations is with reference to a particular matter; but in every State in which they have common-law crimes, where crimes are not defined by statute, it becomes necessary, in exactly the same way, for the man who wants to be entirely advised as to whether or not he is violating the law, to go back to all of the old English decisions and that kind of thing to find out whether in the particular circumstances that surround him he commits larceny or not.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. KNOX. May I not ask the Senator from Montana if the Supreme Court has not gone even further than he has stated? Has not the Supreme Court held that the law of nations is a part of the law of the United States, and that as such it will be enforced by the court?

Mr. WALSH. It has; and so, Mr. President, although there may be more or less uncertainty about the thing—and undoubtedly there is—there is likewise uncertainty about what is the criminal law of any State in which there is no penal code; and the courts simply punish crimes in accordance with what is the common law.

Of course, in exactly the same way you will find the greatest divergence of views among the courts as to what is the common law with reference to a particular subject, and you will find great divergence as to what is the common law with reference to certain crimes, many of the courts holding that the common law makes the doing of acts under a certain state of circumstances a crime and others holding that the common law does not make the doing of those acts under those particular circumstances a crime. I will agree also that in all probability the uncertainty is greater in the case of international law; but I do not believe that the danger is perilous by any means to the ordinary law-abiding citizen.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I think the amendment suggested is a very proper one. I have consulted some other members of the committee, and I agree to accept the amendment which has been tendered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. I hope that will satisfy the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER].

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish to say that, of course, that would eliminate one objection; but I still think it very objectionable to include the phrase "relating to the obligations of the United States under international law." That is too vague and too uncertain to be made the basis upon which to issue a search warrant.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I want to state to the Senator from North Dakota, in reference to what he has said about this being a war measure, that the Attorney General made a report in 1916, in which he urged such legislation as is now proposed. We were not in a state of war at that time. The report which I hold in my hand is very lengthy, and I shall not read it. It cites the authorities, and makes a strong and urgent appeal to Congress to enact a law on this subject. I will say to the Senator from Montana that the recommendation is limited to a penal statute. Therefore the proposed amendment is in accord with the report of the Attorney General. Since reading the report I am glad to accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair requests the Senator from Montana to formally state his amendment.

Mr. WALSH. I understand the amendment presented by the Senator from North Dakota is——

Mr. MCCUMBER. I believe the RECORD will not show that I have offered an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a pending amendment.

Mr. WALSH. In any case, that is a substitute, and I think it will be proper first to perfect the text.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I simply suggested an amendment, but I did not offer it.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is true.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I therefore have not an amendment pending. I will say that, having accepted the other amendment, which is the principal proposition, I shall not offer my suggested substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair calls the attention of Senators to the parliamentary status. The pending question is the committee amendment in section 1, page 33, beginning on line 7, down to and including line 14. If there is no objection, the Chair will dispose of this amendment. The question is upon the amendment.

Mr. WALSH. This is an amendment to that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WALSH. On page 33, line 11, after the word "any," I move to insert the word "penal," so that it will read:

A violation of any penal law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to the committee amendment is agreed to. The Chair hears none. The question now recurs upon the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, on page 33, line 15, to strike out "section 1" and to insert "section 2."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, in the language in section 2, I wish to call the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill to the sixteenth line, and to offer as an amendment to insert the word "authorized" before the word "person."

The reason I suggest that amendment is, that while it is true that in the next section it is contemplated that the authority of the person making the application shall be made known at the time the application for the writ is made, yet it is doubtful whether the authority does not refer to the word "officer," in line 16, and not to the word "person." I think it would be wiser to have it appear that if it is not an officer of the Government who is making the application it should be some authorized person. Then, the next section shows where he gets his authority and what his authority relates to.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania kindly read the language as it will read as he proposes to amend it?

Mr. KNOX. So that it would read:

Before any search warrant shall issue the officer or authorized person desiring its issuance shall make a written application—

And so forth.

Mr. OVERMAN. I shall make no objection to that amendment, Mr. President.

Mr. CUMMINS. I wish to give notice——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I do not understand——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not wish to interrupt this particular part of the chapter.

Mr. WALSH. Then, Mr. President, if the Senator from Iowa will give me the floor——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to say that I do not understand the significance of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. My understanding about this matter is, that the proper affidavit having been made, the warrant should be issued. No authorization to any person to make the affidavit is contemplated by the bill nor does it suggest who would vest such person with the requisite authority.

Mr. KNOX. I do not read the next section in that way, though perhaps I may be mistaken about it. I had an idea that the next section was intended to provide that a person who made the application should show his authority; that is to say, that he has some relation to the enforcement of the law; that it is not intended that any individual shall go and sue out a search warrant against any other individual. I think, if that were the provision of this proposed statute, it would be objectionable.

Mr. WALSH. Subdivision 1 of section 2 provides that the applicant must set out the authority under which he seeks to enforce the rights or obligations of the United States under the laws of nations, and so forth.

Mr. KNOX. The purpose of my amendment, on line 16, was to make it clear that it was a lawful officer or an authorized person—somebody who bore some relation to the enforcement of the law.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think, if the Senator from Montana will yield, that it ought to be some authorized person.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield further?

Mr. CUMMINS. I will yield until this matter is adjusted.

Mr. WALSH. I will make no further contention about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] is agreed to. The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I rose simply to give notice that when the bill reaches the Senate I shall offer a substitute for section 1. I discussed the matter generally this morning in the hope that Senators, who had not hitherto had the subject called to their attention, would think about it and would be better prepared when the bill reached the Senate to consider the amendment than they would be at this moment.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, in chapter 11, section 2, page 33, line 18, after the word "judge," to strike out the words "or magistrate" and insert the word "of."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 33, line 19, after the word "State," strike out the comma; in the same line, after the word "Territorial," to strike out "or municipal"; and in the same line, after the word "United," to strike out the word "of," so as to read:

A State or Territorial court, or to a United States commissioner for the district wherein the property or papers sought are known or believed to be located setting out the following matters:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 33, line 24, after the word "enforcing," to insert "the rights or obligations of the United States under"; and in line 1, on page 34, after the word "nations," to insert the word "the," so as to make the paragraph read:

(1) The authority under which the applicant seeks to enforce, or assist in enforcing, the rights or obligations of the United States under the law of nations, the treaty obligation, or statute law of the United States which he alleges has been, is being, or is intended to be violated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 34, line 6, after the words "violation of," to insert "the rights or obligations of the United States under," so as to make the paragraph read:

(2) The facts upon which his knowledge, or the grounds of his belief, if his application be based upon belief, that a violation of the rights or obligations of the United States under the law of nations, or treaty obligation, or statute of the United States as in this chapter provided has been, is being, or is intended to be accomplished; and.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 34, line 17, to change the number of the section from "2" to "3"; in line 18, after the word "judge," to strike out "magistrate"; and on page 35, line 3, after the word "judge," to strike out "magistrate," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. Upon the making to him of any such application the judge, court, or commissioner to whom the same is addressed shall forthwith consider it and may summon and examine under oath such further witnesses if any as he may deem desirable, or require further affidavits, as the convenience of the case may require; and if the application is based upon knowledge and he shall find that the applicant would be authorized to execute the search warrant, if issued, and that the said application conforms to the requirements of section 1 of this chapter, he shall forthwith issue the same; and if the said application is based upon belief, then the judge or commissioner, as the case may be, shall not only have the power and jurisdiction to inquire into the authority of the applicant to execute the warrant, if issued, and to examine and pass upon the sufficiency of the application therefor, but shall also consider and decide whether there is probable cause to believe that the property or papers to the claimant; whereupon such judge or tended to be possessed, used, or employed in the manner set out in said application. If he shall decide that the applicant is authorized to have a search warrant issued to him, and that the application is in due form, and further, that there is probable cause for its issuance, he shall forthwith issue such warrant. The officer issuing such warrant must insert a direction in the warrant that it be served in the daytime, unless the affidavit be positive that the property is on the person or in the place to be searched; in which case he may insert a direction that it be served at any time in the day or night.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 35, line 21, to change the number of the section from "3" to "4"; in line 24, after the word "judge," to strike out "magistrate"; and on page 36, line 4, after the word "judge," to strike out "magistrate," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. Whoever shall use or attempt to use the mails or Postal Servtained on a search warrant issued under the provisions of this chapter, the owner or claimant thereof may forthwith file with the judge or commissioner issuing said warrant, his petition setting out his title or claim of ownership to, or right to the custody of such property or papers, and any other facts legally tending to require restoration of the property or papers described have been, are being, or are incommissioner, after due notice, not exceeding five days, to the United States attorney for the district and the persons making such seizure shall proceed to speedily hear and determine the case, and order the property or papers restored to the owner or claimant, or shall order the same retained in the custody of the person seizing them to be used as evidence in any case or proceeding, civil or criminal, in which the United States may be interested, or to be otherwise disposed of according to law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 36, line 13, to change the number of the section from "4" to "5"; in line 14, after the word "civil," to strike out "military or naval"; and in line 17, after the words "the United States," to insert, "Provided, That in time of war such warrant may be issued to a civil, military, or naval officer of the United States," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 5. No search warrant shall issue hereunder to other than a civil officer of the United States duly authorized to enforce or assist in the enforcement of any law thereof, or to a person so duly authorized by the President of the United States: Provided, That in time of war such warrant may be issued to a civil, military, or naval officer of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 37, after line 2, to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 7. Whoever shall knowingly and willfully hold, secure, or use any property or papers, in violation of, or in aid of the violation of, any law of the United States, or of any treaty of the United States, or of the rights or obligations of the United States under the law of nations, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, to harmonize that section with secton 1, the word "penal" should be inserted, in line 5, between the word "any" and the word "law." Such an amendment was made in section 1 on motion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], and the same word should be inserted here. It would then read "of any penal law of the United States."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the amendment of the committee, on page 37, line 5, before the word "law," it is proposed to insert the word "penal," so as to read, "or in aid of the violation of any penal law of the United States."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment is agreed to without objection. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that when the bill reaches the Senate I shall offer a substitute for section 7, which will be coupled up more directly with section 1.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I offer an amendment proposing a new section, to be known as section 9, to this chapter, which I ask to have considered now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 37, after line 12, it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. 9. Sections 125 and 126 of the Criminal Code of the United States shall apply to and embrace all persons making oath or affirmation under the provisions of this act or any of them and shall be subject to all the pains and penalties of said sections 125 and 126.

Mr. THOMAS. That amendment, Mr. President, is designed to apply the statutes concerning perjury and the punishment therefor to this chapter. I do not think that it is necessary, but I think, out of abundance of caution, it should be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, on page 37, after the amendment last agreed to, to insert:

CHAPTER XII.

USE OF MAILS.

SECTION 1. Every letter, writing, circular, postal card, picture, print, engraving, photograph, newspaper, pamphlet, book, or other publication, matter, or thing, of any kind, in violation of any of the provisions of this act, or intended or calculated to induce, promote, or further any of the acts or things by any provisions of this act declared unlawful, is hereby declared to be nonmailable matter and shall not be conveyed in the mails or delivered from any post office or by any letter carrier.

SEC. 2. Every letter, writing, circular, postal card, picture, print, engraving, photograph, newspaper, pamphlet, book, or other publication, matter or thing, of any kind, containing any matter of a seditious, anarchistic, or treasonable character, is hereby declared to be nonmailable.

SEC. 3. The Postmaster General may, upon evidence satisfactory to him that any person, concern, association, or company is engaged in using the mails for the circulation or dissemination of any matter by this act declared to be nonmailable, forbid the use of the mails by any such person, concern, association, or company.

SEC. 4. Whenever any property or papers shall be seized and deice of the Government for the transmission of any matter declared by this chapter to be nonmailable shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both. Any person violating any provision of this chapter may be tried and punished either in the district in which the unlawful matter or publication was mailed, or to which it was carried by mail for delivery according to the direction thereon, or in which it was caused to be delivered by mail to the person to whom it was addressed.

SEC. 5. An order of the Postmaster General forbidding the use of the mails in any case under the provisions of this chapter shall be subject to review by injunction proceedings instituted in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia.

During the reading of the amendment,

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I desire to offer a suggestion to the Senator in charge of the bill. Section 2 of the amendment just read forbids the mailing of "any matter of a seditious, anarchistic, or treasonable character." I suggest inserting the word "libelous" as well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair inquires of the Senator from Ohio where he desires to have the word inserted?

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold that amendment for a few moments?

Mr. POMERENE. Very well.

After reading of the amendment was concluded,

Mr. OVERMAN. I shall ask that section 5 be stricken out, as it is useless. I notice from the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States that this question has been passed upon, and it has been decided that the Federal courts have jurisdiction in any State of the Union to review the decision of the Postmaster General in refusing admission to the mails. I therefore ask that section 5 be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina moves that section 5 be stricken out.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. OVERMAN. I will repeat, for the benefit of the Senator, that section 5 is not necessary to this bill. I find from the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States that the Federal courts have jurisdiction to review the orders of the Postmaster General refusing admission to the mails.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I did not rise for the purpose of discussing that matter. It may or may not be that the courts have power to set aside an order of the Postmaster General forbidding the use of the mails to certain persons who have been guilty, as alleged, of the offense of mailing nonmailable matter. I am opposed to the chapter for much broader reasons than the difficulty of a review in the courts. This chapter gives to the Postmaster General, or to any postmaster, the authority to refuse to carry or transmit anything that, in his judgment, either violates any of the provisions of this act or which is "intended or calculated to induce, promote, or further" any of the things that are declared by the act to be unlawful.

Mr. President, I protest against the extension of the power of an administrative officer to that extent, whether it be the Postmaster General, or whether it be the postmaster of some specific place, or whether it be an inspector of the Post Office Department. The words, "or intended or calculated to induce, promote, or further any of the acts or things by any provision of this act declared unlawful" are without limit. It is simply a matter for the post-office official to determine for himself whether a given article, a given letter, a given circular, a given newspaper is "intended or calculated to induce, promote, or further" any of the violations which are designated in the preceding 11 chapters which create a great variety and a great number of additional offenses.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Senator will notice that it is not an emergency chapter.

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, no. This has nothing whatever to do with the war. This is declared now to be a part of the general policy of the United States.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. How would the Postmaster General determine all these things except upon the theory that the bill authorizes him to open any and every letter that goes through the post office?

Mr. CUMMINS. Undoubtedly it authorizes him to do that. There is no other way in which he could exercise the authority that is here given to him. He can open every newspaper, every pamphlet, every circular, every letter deposited in the mail, and then it is for him to reach a conclusion upon this question. For instance, does this paper or circular or letter tend to induce or promote the violation of the rights of the United States under the law of nations, or it is calculated to promote the violation of some treaty of the United States, and so forth.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator will permit me, I think that the powers of the Postmaster General under section 3 go even further than that. He can do all these things or any of them upon evidence that is satisfactory to him. The Senator from Iowa might be a publisher of a newspaper which entered into competition with a newspaper which I might be publishing, and he might indulge in criticisms or statements or comments which I, as an enemy of his, would take advantage of, or could take advantage of, to represent to the Postmaster General as being in violation of the provisions of this section; and the Postmaster General, having confidence in me, and being suspicious of the Senator, might act upon that as evidence satisfactory to him and prohibit from access to the mails the Senator's newspaper or letters or any other documents which might fall within the inhibition of the chapter.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Colorado is quite right. The action of the Postmaster General or of the Post Office official is ex parte entirely; the hearing, the examination, the investigation are ex parte. The person who is interested, or whose privileges are affected by the acts of the Post Office officials, is not present; he has no right to be present, and the law does not require that he shall be notified. It is simply establishing an espionage and censorship, which I think can not be comprehended by those who are silently sitting by and allowing such legislation to pass, or they would rebel against it. We are not only reenacting here all the dangers of the so-called espionage chapter of the bill but every other chapter of the bill, and we are creating the Postmaster General or the inspectors or the postmasters the judges, not only of the infraction of the law but we are committing to them the duty or the discretion to determine whether the matter that is sought to be carried in the mails is "calculated to induce, promote, or further" any violations of the law.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa just what the word "seditious" means? I have found it very difficult to find a definition of the word "seditious," as laid down by the courts, which has really any limitation. Of course, the courts have held certain things to be seditious, but they have not defined just what "sedition" means in its full extent.

I noticed the other day that a paper published in San Francisco was denied the mails because it published an editorial criticizing the President. I presume that in time of war the Postmaster General would be likely to come to the conclusion, honestly enough, that a criticism of any one of the departments which has to do with the carrying on of the war was seditious.

If this measure passes, therefore, in its present form there is no use to worry about the censorship of the press, for that will be lodged absolutely in the hands of the Postmaster General.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I think no one would be rash enough to attempt a definition of the word "seditious" as employed in this chapter. In criminal law the word has been applied; but I take it that the word "seditious," as used here and as used in common parlance, would embrace any letter or publication that would unreasonably, if you please, criticize the Government; anything that might stir up dissension, discontent, disaffection, in or among the people of the country.

I would not so much object to a prohibition against sedition. I think if the accusation for sedition were made in the way common and known to the criminal law, and before a judge of learning in the law, and of the standing which judges ought to have and usually do have among the people, there would be no great danger; but you are here committing the discretion to the post-office inspector, who tries the accusation of sedition and determines whether the communication or the matter deposited in the mail, no matter what its character may be, is seditious; and if he finds it to be seditious he eliminates it from the mail, and there is no adequate remedy whatsoever for his acts.

If the Postmaster General were to issue an order prescribing a certain character of literature or a certain publication issued by a certain person or corporation, and saying that that person or corporation could not longer send that literature through the mail, there might be a remedy, a very long-delayed and ineffective remedy; but there is no remedy for the destruction of the nonmailable matter which passes through the mails from day to day.

Mr. KING. Mr President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I agree with very much of what the Senator has said, and as this chapter is now written I shall not vote for it; but I desire to ask the Senator if he does not think there should be some statute enacted by which publications that denounce the laws of the United States, and urge their constant infraction, ought to be prohibited from being carried through the mails of the United States?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. Does the Senator mean all the laws, or some particular law? I know a good many laws that ought to be denounced.

Mr. KING. With the permission of the Senator from Iowa, I will ask the Senator from Colorado if he thinks the Government of the United States ought to be the instrumentality for the denouncement of its own laws; that it ought to furnish the instrumentality by which every man who seeks to undermine the Government and destroy the authority of its officials may have these publications carried throughout the United States?

Mr. THOMAS. I do not think so, but I think the limitations that you seek to put upon such matter going through the mails will be productive, in all probability, of far more injury and damage to the common mass of our citizenship than they will prove to be of benefit to the country.

Mr. KING. One other question——

Mr. CUMMINS. If I may further answer the question put by the Senator from Utah, I do not agree with him with regard to the matter. I have rather severely criticized the chapter which has just been adopted, namely, the chapter enlarging our procedure with regard to search warrants; but I would think that my Government was rather tyrannical and unreasonable if it refused to send my speech through the mails if I were to pay the postage upon it as provided by law. I do not believe that is the way to reach offenses of that kind. If any person is guilty of any crime against the United States in either saying or publishing particular matter, he ought to be punished as a criminal, but his punishment ought not to be handed over to the ill-considered ex parte proceeding carried on by a post-office inspector.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. With the permission of the Senator who has just addressed the Senate, I should like to answer, in just a word, the query that was put by the Senator from Utah. That query, as I understand it, was, Did we believe that the Post Office Department or the Government of the United States should be the means for the transmission of that which denounced the laws or denounced the policy of the Government of the United States? The answer is found in the answer to the question, To whom does the Government of the United States belong? If it belongs to all the people, it should be the means for the transmission of the expression of the views of all the people of the United States. If it belongs to but a part of the people, it should be the means for the transmission of the views of but a part of the people of the United States.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa allow me to suggest a matter to the Senator from California?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. OVERMAN. What would the Senator say about this paper, which is now being circulated through the mails?—

Workers, refuse to take up arms against the workers of any country! If the Government forces you into the Army, use their guns against them to overthrow their power and to emancipate yourselves from slavery.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I would say that such a document was rot and was nonsense, and that it was a document to which no man with any degree of sanity would for one instant give the slightest recognition or the slightest credence; but I say, as well, that any citizen of the United States has the right freely to express his views within the constitutional limitations, and any newspaper in the United States has the right freely to express its views within the constitutional limitations.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator thinks, then, that a man who is guilty of treason, a traitor, would have the right to publish a paper in this country and have it circulated?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. The Senator asks whether a man guilty of treason would have the right to publish papers?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. OVERMAN. To publish papers and circulate treasonable matter in the mails.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I am not speaking in the slightest degree of circulating treasonable matter in the mails. I am speaking of the indefinite designation by some particular official of the Government of what may be seditious or treasonable. When you leave uncertain the determination of what may be seditious, and without definition give to some subordinate official the power by his mere ipse dixit to make a citizen a felon, you have strayed far from democracy and American ideas of freedom. The Senator from North Carolina and the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Utah, able and experienced as they are in any given case, might disagree. Whose determination, then, among these three Senators is the one that should ultimately decide what would be seditious and what should be transmitted in the mails?

Mr. OVERMAN. Why, Mr. President, no man on earth would say that that was not treasonable matter.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I make a suggestion?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. No man would say that that was proper material to be transmitted; but the danger lies in the fact that there is no limitation, except what the ex parte judge may say, as to what may not be transmitted.

Mr. OVERMAN. I appreciate the point. I wish we could amend this. There are certain papers that I should like to stop from going through the mails. There is a paper circulating in the South, I am told in a telegram, advising the negroes of the South that now is the time for them to rise up, slay the white people of the South, and take charge of the Southland.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. You have upon your statute books, if the Senator will permit me to suggest, various penal statutes which will enable you to deal with anything that incites to riot and the like.

Mr. OVERMAN. Would not the Senator from California forbid that kind of a paper from going through the mails, circulating among the poor colored men of the South?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Oh, possibly so; but that is wide from this particular issue and far apart from the matter that we are discussing here.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to narrow it down, if possible. I do not want to make it too broad, but such treasonable matter as that ought to be stopped from going through the mails. I do not see how anyone could object to stopping that kind of stuff from going through the mails. The paper is now being circulated from New York, and why should we let a paper like that circulate among the poor negroes of the South, urging them to rise up and slay the white people?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Nobody who is advocating what we advocate in respect to this particular chapter would for one instant contend that that sort of thing should be permitted any wide dissemination; but that is not the question that is presented here at all. The question is much broader and much deeper; and neither of us—and that, after all, is a point that is fundamental in democratic government—can take upon ourselves the determination of what ought and what ought not to go through the mails. There must be, in a statute such as this, ample designation and ample description before any such statute should be permitted to become, in any degree, a part of the law of the land.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa now yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, while I would prefer to go on, I yield to the Senator from Illinois if he desires to interrupt me.

Mr. LEWIS. I should like to ask the able Senator who has charge of this bill and the Senator from Iowa, if the construction be accurate that is placed upon the measure by the Senator from Idaho and the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Iowa, could the speeches of a Senator who might oppose the policy of the Government in the exercise of his duty as a Senator be made the subject, under this provision, of the postmaster's right to open, read, and conclude in his opinion that such matter was seditious, and therefore he would not circulate the expressions of the public representatives?

Mr. THOMAS. Why, certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the purpose of the law.

Mr. LEWIS. Does the Senator feel—and may I ask the Senator from North Carolina if he agrees—that the provision would probably permit the postmaster to stop the delivery of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, for instance, containing the speeches of a Senator, because he objected to the sentiments therein contained, and thought they were, in his judgment, seditious, or that they opposed the policy of the Government?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not think so. I do not think he would attempt to stop the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD from going through the mails, or any copy of it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know. I think there are copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD which might very easily fall within the operations of this chapter.

Mr. OVERMAN and Mr. THOMAS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield, and to whom?

Mr. CUMMINS. Who desires to interrupt me?

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois a question.

Mr. CUMMINS. I had yielded to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask the Senator from Iowa to let me ask the Senator from Illinois a question.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will ask the Senator from Illinois if he thinks this ought to go through the mails:

> But, alas! here are two flags, one colored with stars and stripes, and side by side a black one, with a white inscription: "Men wanted for the Army." That is, food for the cannon is wanted to protect the colored, useless rag.
> What is the significance of a national flag? Every national flag is a symbol of bondage, oppression, an attack on other nations, rape, force, and fratricide.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I would say to the Senator that at times like these I would not allow such matter to go through the mails; but because such matter ought to be prohibited, I ask the Senator whether he thinks a clause so general as to permit the postmaster also to prohibit the mere expressions of a public representative should be enacted into law?

Mr. OVERMAN. I have just said that if we could confine it to matters of that kind—treasonable matter, anarchistic matter—I should be glad to do so.

Mr. LEWIS. That would meet my approval. I fear a provision of this breadth.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from North Carolina has given one extreme example. Now, let me give another from the other extreme.

I read in the New York Sun, under date of April 28, that some one had censored "The Star-Spangled Banner," and that the fourth verse of "The Star-Spangled Banner" was, in official life, to be left out hereafter, because it might ruffle the relationship with one of our allies. Now, that was published in the New York Sun as an authoritative statement.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator think that the authority given here in this statute would authorize the Postmaster General to stop it in the mails?

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, I said a few moments ago that if this law passes as it is written there, we need not stop to discuss the other provision of this bill with reference to censorship of the press, when you have a better censor in the Postmaster General than you can get in anybody else, so far as this situation is concerned. I can not imagine why the fourth verse was left out of "The Star-Spangled Banner" unless it was supposed to be, under the peculiar circumstances which now surround us, seditious.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. Who has authority to omit a stanza?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I can answer the question of the Senator from Indiana. Everybody, every individual citizen in the United States, has authority to omit one stanza, or two. I think it is very largely a matter of good taste.

Mr. WATSON. It is very largely a matter of ability to sing it, I think, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Washington is correct if it is left to me to exercise my own judgment; but if I happen to be a member of the Army, the Navy, or in official life in some other way, and if I desire to sing the fourth verse, I do not want somebody else to tell me that I must not do it, lest I be reprimanded.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I agree with the Senator in that. I think it is execrable judgment and lack of taste.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I hope we will not be drawn from the real point in controversy. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, my attention was attracted by a remark made by the Senator from Idaho to the effect that what he objected to was allowing an individual down here in the department to judge of this matter. I call attention to the fact that we have reposed in the Postmaster General a vast power in connection with this matter, and I invite the attention of the Senator from California to the fact. We make unmailable matter that is calculated to defraud or to aid in a scheme to defraud. Likewise, we make unmailable obscene matter. Often it is difficult to tell whether a particular paper falls within the condemnation of either of these statutes, and we have found it necessary to repose in the Postmaster General the power to decide.

Now let me inquire of the Senator from California, with the permission of the Senator from Iowa, whether it is not quite proper to authorize the Postmaster General to exclude from the mails papers intended to incite people to commit crimes? Would the Senator from California deny to the Postmaster General the right to exclude from the mails papers calculated to incite the commission of crimes?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Under which designation, if you please?

Mr. WALSH. I do not want to discuss the language of the statute now; but I understood the Senator from California to object to leaving this matter to the decision of the Postmaster General.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Surely.

Mr. WALSH. Then the Senator would object, as I understand him, to a statute——

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I would object to leaving the determination of what might be a political question, what might be the dividing line upon a question of social policy, and the like, to any particular official.

Mr. WALSH. Why, Mr. President, there is not any controversy between the Senator from California and myself about that. That was not the question. The question I addressed to the Senator from California was whether he objects to giving to the Postmaster General power to exclude from the mails papers which are calculated to incite the commission of crimes.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. It would depend entirely upon the language of the particular enactment—wholly so.

Mr. WALSH. I understand the Senator, then. The Senator would be quite willing to allow the passage through the mails of papers that are calculated to incite the commission of certain crimes?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. No; I beg the Senator's pardon. Of course, I do not dispute that the distinguished Senator understands me in that particular way; but, if so, he is laboring under a misapprehension entirely. I would insist upon such designation, if it were attempted, upon such definition that the ordinary man might be able to know the particular offense with which he is charged; I would leave to no subordinate the power to determine what might be "calculated" to incite crime. But all of that begs the particular question here. When you use the terms "seditious" and "anarchistic," you get into a realm that is far different from that which the Senator from Montana is discussing, and that particular realm is one where we should be particularly careful in the determination of just exactly what we mean.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I felt very sure that when the Senator from California reflected upon this matter he would find no reason to deny to the Postmaster General the right to exclude from the mail matter calculated to incite or induce the commission of crimes of any character. As I understand the Senator, the bill before us does not reach the case that he has in mind at all. Now, I would not care to intrust to the Postmaster General the right to say whether certain matter was anarchistic or socialistic or contravened certain social principles. That is not the question. The question is, when the law denounces a certain thing as a crime, Should the Postmaster General be authorized to exclude matter that is calculated to incite the commission of a crime?

Now, I agree with the Senator that, speaking with reference to section 1, the language might perhaps be made very much more specific and definite; but the general principle can not be disputed that we must vest the Postmaster General with power to exclude matter of this kind from the mails.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. May I ask the Senator from Montana whether he means to exclude matter of a seditious, anarchistic kind, as designated in this particular act?

Mr. WALSH. I do not find anything of that kind in the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Why, it is in section 2. That is the section about which we are talking.

Mr. WALSH. Oh! I was speaking about section 1.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I see from what is said that there is no difference between the Senator from Montana and myself. He was not aware, however, of the particular matter which we were discussing and the particular words to which our attention had been devoted.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I should like to go forward with my observations.

Mr. STERLING. If the Senator will indulge me just a moment for a question.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield; but I hope it will be confined to a question.

Mr. STERLING. I understood the Senator from California awhile ago in his general discussion to oppose section 1 of this chapter.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I have been speaking entirely of section 2.

Mr. STERLING. I should like to ask the Senator from California, then, in view of what he said in regard to section 2, whether he objects to making nonmailable the matter specified in section 1?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Of course I do. The words are:

> Intended or calculated to induce, promote, or further any of the acts or things by any provision of this act declared unlawful.

Why, language like that is so broad that it might include any conceivable act of any individual which might be construed by some other individual to have promoted the infraction of some particular part of the act. And I now have pending before the Senate a motion to strike out a part of the general bill containing some of these crimes which are to rest entirely in some official's mind.

Mr. STERLING. By the other provisions of this act, I will say to the Senator from California, the Senate, in Committee of the Whole, declared that certain acts are unlawful. They are crimes and offenses against the United States. Now, does the Senator believe that matter intended to induce, promote, or further the commission of any of those acts should be mailable?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. The Senator is not aware—with the permission of the Senator from Iowa, and then I will not trespass again upon his time—that I have pending a motion to strike out a part of that which has already been passed, and it doubtless will be argued on Monday. It will then, in this fashion, answer his inquiry, I think.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa has the floor.

Mr. CUMMINS. If there is no other Senator who desires to speak, I will continue my observations upon this chapter.

It will be seen that the first section gives to the Postmaster General or any officer of the Post Office Department who happens to be in the custody of the mail the right to exclude anything that in his judgment is calculated to induce, promote, or further any of the acts which are forbidden in the 11 preceding chapters. The Senator from Montana referred to the present statute, which makes nonmailable matter calculated to induce fraud or, I think, to obtain money upon false pretenses. I know it is difficult to draw the line of safety, but I suppose the Senator from Montana and everybody in the Senate knows that there have been many, many instances of the most grievous injustice perpetrated under that statute. I know myself. It happened to come to me before I became a Member of the Senate. I know of three instances in which honest, straightforward, upright citizens conducting a perfectly legitimate business were ruined by the orders of the Postmaster General excluding the matter which it was proposed to mail from the mails and forbidding not only the transmission of the particular matter pertaining to the subject in hand but forbidding the citizen any use of the mails, no matter how innocent the subject might be.

Mr. WALSH. Would the Senator from Iowa suggest a repeal of that statute?

Mr. CUMMINS. I would be willing to change it mightily. I have no doubt there ought to be a hearing had and opportunity to exclude such matter from the mail, but I am entirely unwilling to submit the question to an obscure official of the Post Office Department to investigate and act without any opportunity whatever for those who are interested to be heard until after the decision is reached, and then it is practically impossible to secure a reversal of the finding already made.

Now, remembering that, but not understanding me to desire that the mails shall have no protection whatever, I refer to the scope of this first section of chapter 12, "calculated to induce, promote, or further any of the acts or things by any provision of this act declared unlawful." Immediately before chapter 12 we find the section that we have been discussing:

> Whoever shall knowingly and willfully hold, secure, or use any property or papers, in violation of, or in aid of the violation of, any law of the United States, or of any treaty of the United States, or of the rights or obligations of the United States under the law of nations, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

We give here to the Post Office Department the right to determine secretly whether any particular communication or paper is calculated further to induce or promote the violation of the section I have just read. The breadth of the discretion reposed in the official of the Post Office Department is apparent; it is unsafe. It never ought to be established as the law.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. How would the Senator regard a change from the use of the word "act" to the word "chapter," so that violations punishable here would be limited to those mentioned in this chapter?

Mr. CUMMINS. There are none mentioned in the chapter except——

Mr. FLETCHER. Oh, yes. "Every letter, writing, circular, postal card, picture, print, engraving, photograph, newspaper, pamphlet, book, or other publication, matter, or thing of any kind containing any matter of a seditious, anarchistic, or treasonable character, is hereby declared to be nonmailable." And then provision is made for the punishment of anybody using the mails in the distribution of nonmailable matter. That covers the whole ground, it seems to me.

Mr. CUMMINS. The chapter would mean nothing, then. I would greatly prefer it as compared with the present chapter. There is no prohibition other than is found in the words I have read.

Mr. FLETCHER. Section 1 provides that "every letter, writing," and so forth, "of any kind in violation of the provision of this chapter is hereby declared to be nonmailable and shall not be conveyed or delivered," and so forth. Now, would the words "provided in this chapter"; that is, "every letter, writing, circular, postal card, picture, print, engraving," and so forth, "containing any matter of a seditious, anarchistic, or treasonable character, is declared to be nonmailable" improve it? You provide in section 1 that none of that material shall be admitted to the mails; it is nonmailable.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is no use to declare it nonmailable twice; it is declared nonmailable in the second section.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is declared nonmailable in the second section, but in section 4 "whoever shall use or attempt to use the mails or Postal Service * * * for the transmission of any matter declared by this chapter to be nonmailable" is punishable by fine and imprisonment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think that it would very greatly improve the chapter if section 1 were stricken out, and that would be the effect of the suggestion just made by the Senator from Florida, as I look at it.

Mr. FLETCHER. There is another thought in this connection, and it may meet the objection raised by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. In case a person should mail one of these letters which the Postmaster General would declare to be nonmailable and an inspector swears out a warrant against him and he is arrested, it is then for the court to determine; it is not for the Postmaster General to say whether he shall be punished or not; it is for the court to determine whether he has used the mails in transmitting nonmailable matter, and then the letter is to be offered to determine whether it is nonmailable within the meaning of section 2.

Mr. CUMMINS. Suppose he is not arrested; what becomes of the letter?

Mr. FLETCHER. He is forbidden the use of the mails on the order of the Postmaster General.

Mr. CUMMINS. Suppose he is not arrested and the letter or communication is not sent; the communication is destroyed?

Mr. FLETCHER. He would have to proceed under the law now existing to enjoin the Postmaster General.

Mr. CUMMINS. From what?

Mr. FLETCHER. For interfering with his mail.

Mr. CUMMINS. For refusing to send the letter?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. To me that remedy is almost grotesque.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. KING. Before the Senator leaves the matter he is discussing, I wish to inquire whether I understood his answer correctly in response to the question propounded by the Senator from Colorado. As I understood the Senator from Iowa, he stated that as he interpreted this proposed statute, it would give authority to the Postmaster General to invade the secrecy of any letters or papers that were placed in the mail for transmission.

I wish to ask the Senator from Iowa if he is not mistaken in that view, if I interpreted his answer correctly; and if not this statute parallels the statutes of the United States with respect to the matter to which the Senator from Montana referred.

If I may go a little further the court in the ex parte Jackson case states with respect to that class of matter that:

> The constitutional guaranty of the right of the people to be secure in their papers against unreasonable searches and seizures extends to their papers, thus closed against inspection, wherever they may be. While in the mail, they can only be opened and examined under like warrant, issued upon similar oath or affirmation, particularly describing the thing to be seized, as is required when papers are subjected to search in one's own household.

The point I am trying to make——

Mr. CUMMINS. That ought to be the law, but it is not the practice.

Mr. KING. That section is the law, I understand. I ask the Senator from Iowa if the proposed chapter would change in any way the law as it has been expounded by the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. CUMMINS. I doubt whether that is the law at present or ever was—I mean the law that governs the post-office inspectors. The Senator from Utah knows perfectly well that they do not swear out a search warrant in order to get possession of a letter. There is no provision in the law for a search warrant, as I remember it, to secure possession of letters in the custody of the mails. Is there, I ask the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KING. Replying to the Senator from Iowa, I think there is no specific statute. I am not sure how far there is any statute with respect to search warrants and seizures. For that reason the chapter to which attention has been given this afternoon seems to me to be necessary to be passed, or one of like import.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, we have already discussed section 2 in sufficient detail and I now read section 3, which still, I think, is more severe in its operation:

> SEC. 3. The Postmaster General may, upon evidence satisfactory to him that any person, concern, association, or company is engaged in using the mails for the circulation or dissemination of any matter by this act declared to be nonmailable, forbid the use of the mails by any such person, concern, association, or company.

That means that not only is objectionable matter to be excluded from the mail or taken from the mail and destroyed, but that the person who has attempted to use the mail for any such purpose shall not be permitted to use it for any purpose, however legitimate or honest.

I know that is the law at the present time with regard to certain classes of nonmailable matter, but when you broaden the judgment or discretion of the Post Office Department so as to take in practically everything that relates to our political, social, and industrial life, I very respectfully submit that we ought not to impose a penalty of that kind upon one who is so unfortunate as to attempt to send through the mail matter which does not meet the approval of the Post Office Department.

It is the purpose, of course, of this chapter, as it has been the purpose of all the legislation for the last three years, to draw within the authority of the executive department all powers of government. This is but a part of a broad, general, and comprehensive effort to change, as I think, the whole character of the Government. I am opposed to it. I am opposed to it fundamentally and essentially. I am not opposed to laying upon the individual the most stringent penalties for a violation of the law; but I believe when the citizen is accused he has a right to a trial, an open, public trial, with an opportunity to present his evidence before he is condemned, before the penalty is exacted from him. This chapter denies him any such opportunity, and it ought not to be adopted.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has, I think, expressed the views which I entertain regarding this chapter so completely as to make any very extended discussion of it unnecessary on my part. I merely wish to add my approval of his criticism and to call attention to some few of the probable consequences of the enactment of this chapter in its practical application to conditions as they will be unfolded during the progress of the war.

There can be no question that the purpose sought to be subserved by the committee in reporting this chapter is a most important and serious one, the design being to prevent the use of a public agency for the dissemination of treasonable matter. There is, no doubt, a difficulty, too, perhaps almost insuperable, in the task of framing sections carrying out that purpose thoroughly and completely without at the same time trenching upon some of the fundamental rights of the citizen. Hence, I have the most abundant sympathy for the committee's bill with regard to the object which it has sought to accomplish and the difficulty of accomplishing it through the use of printed language. But, Mr. President, I can not avoid the impression that if to accomplish that purpose it is necessary to enact a law as far reaching, as despotic, and as arbitrary as this must be, we had better regulate or attempt to regulate the evil which it is designed to destroy in some other way.

Now, this language is as comprehensive as any that can be found in the bill. It covers—> every letter, writing, circular, postal card, * * * newspaper—

And so forth, which is—> in violation of any of the provisions of this act, or intended or calculated to induce, promote, or further any of the acts or things by any provision of this act declared unlawful.

It is not an emergency proposition. It proposes the enactment of a permanent statute which will define and control and enlarge, as the case may be, the administration of the postal department in the future. Of course, that objection may be eliminated by appropriate amendment; but even during this period the crisis now confronting the Nation and which will be with us in all probability for an indefinite period, it is practically or may prove practically to be if not the destruction certainly serious injury to the very things which compelled us to take up arms in this mighty struggle.

Despotic authority can be created in a republic and sometimes is exercised in a republic without the sanction of law as well as in an autocratic despotism. The fundamentals of free government everywhere must be the exercise of free speech within proper limitation and freedom of the press, the right of the citizen to be exempt from searches and seizures, to meet in assemblies, and peaceably to petition. Without them free government is inconceivable. No such government has ever existed in their absence nor can it exist.

Criticism of the Government, of our public officials, is one of the healthiest elements of free government, one of the things essential to keep it pure and to keep it free; and that is as true in times of war as it is in times of peace.

We have, of course, as everyone knows, elements in this country which are not only opposed to the war but which are inimical to the Government. We have other elements which are opposed to every government and which preach and practice anarchy. The war did not create this latter class. They have existed and have been organized for years. It is true the present opportunity is the most welcome one which they have thus far encountered. They may and probably will attempt to utilize it for the propagation and the exercise of their doctrines to a degree not hitherto attempted, and they ought to be suppressed.

I say that frankly. Indeed, the dissemination of documents, such as the Senator from North Carolina has called the attention of the Senate to, are in themselves treasonable acts, and as such ought to be punished by indictment, prosecution, and conviction independently of whether they are circulated through the mails or whether they are distributed in some other manner. The man who to-day counsels any of our citizens to resist the Government in its efforts to carry through this war successfully, who urges men to use the arms placed in their hands not against the common enemy but against the Government itself, is guilty of treason and should be punished accordingly.

If there is no law to meet such conditions, then let us enact one as speedily as possible. Of course that does not do away with the necessity of preventing the circulation of such doctrines through periodicals devoted to them, but, Mr. President, every document, every newspaper, every photograph, every letter which, in the opinion of the man who for the time being happens to be Postmaster General, tends to violate this chapter of the bill, can not only be excluded from the mails but the writer or sender of it may be forbidden the use of the mails for any purpose whatsoever. Then, Mr. President, the evil wrought by the legislation of this body will be far more serious and extensive, far more despotic and tyrannical, far more likely to be subject to abuse, than the information which is sought to be destroyed by this legislation.

Let us see how this would work. It has been an axiom of republics for centuries that absolute power can be intrusted with safety to no man. He may be the most benevolent man, the most highly educated, the most wise, the most statesmanlike, the most thoroughly devoted to republican principles of any man living, and yet clothe him with absolute power, and history teaches that sooner or later he will abuse it.

This invests, in my judgment, the Postmaster General with absolute authority over one of the greatest agencies, if not the greatest agency, for the circulation and distribution of intelligence that ever existed in this or in any other country. He can exclude, upon evidence satisfactory to him, letters and documents sought to be mailed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] if, for any reason, I can convince him that the documents so sought to be mailed violate or tend to violate any of the provisions of this chapter. A certain class of newspapers in this country are devoted to denunciations of Catholicism as dangerous to the peace and welfare and integrity of the United States. Another class of newspapers—some of them brought into being by these attacks, others previously existing but brought into the arena of controversy—go to the other extreme, naturally driven thereto by the fierce resentment which all religious controversies must excite. Let us suppose that the Postmaster General for the time being in office may be a partisan upon one or the other side of the controversy. Naturally he sympathizes with the side with which he is affiliated; naturally he feels that the tenets and doctrines and publications of the other are treasonable. So we place in the hands of such a man, not only now but for all time, the power either to discriminate and exclude one set of publications from the mails and their publishers also from access to the mails for any purpose, while giving the other the widest latitude and permitting their pamphlets and periodicals to circulate without limitation. That is one instance, merely one illustration, of the extent to which the power we here propose to endow an official of the General Government with may go.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to say that I can not conceive that this proposed statute would apply to the situation which the Senator from Colorado mentions, because I should suppose that matter would not come under the head of either "seditious, anarchistic, or treasonable character."

Mr. THOMAS. Why not?

Mr. FLETCHER. At any rate, what I arose to ask the Senator was, whether or not the bill as it now stands would be relieved of objection if section 3 were stricken out?

Mr. THOMAS. Of course, Mr. President, that unquestionably would be a relief. Still, the remaining sections are so obnoxious to my sense of justice, to say nothing of the violation of the protection afforded by the Bill of Rights in other directions, that I think it all ought to go out, or else that it should be much more extensively modified than the suggestion of the Senator from Florida would permit.

Reference was made some time ago to statutes which are designed to prevent the use of the mails for the circulation of literature, as it is called, relating to fraudulent schemes; and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] called attention to the extent to which abuses under that very laudable scheme of legislation have extended. Why, Mr. President, in my State two of our most reputable citizens, men of character, men of integrity, men of the highest morality, are to-day under indictment, forsooth, because of the so-called violation of these laws as the outgrowth of an enterprise in the State of Florida, which my friend the Senator from Florida so well represents here. In my judgment they are absolutely innocent; but let that be established, as it doubtless will be, still there is the disgrace, the humiliation, the trouble, the expense, and, above all, the infinite injury to an enterprise which is as free from any scheme of dishonesty as an enterprise can be. What shall we say of the effect of the operation of that system of laws upon those who, through the resentment—the malice, if you please—or the mistaken judgment of the inspector, have been afflicted with so much punishment?

This chapter, if it is enacted into law, will necessarily create a new brood of inspectors, all eager and zealous not only to perform their duty but to demonstrate to the Government the absolute necessity to its welfare of their continued employment. The number of cases and instances of the violation of the law which they may be able to call to the attention of the department will probably be considered as the measure of their merit and the means of their promotion. As a result the mail of every suspected man and woman in this country must necessarily be opened and examined, in order to determine if the suspicions entertained, whether rightly or wrongly, of their purposes and objects are well founded. That in itself, Mr. President, is a monstrous situation. It may not be resorted to, and yet I can not escape the conviction that, if the law is to be effective at all, it can only be made effective through such a process.

The other methods of establishing to the satisfaction of the Postmaster General the existence of these things will not be sufficiently comprehensive to embrace all the varied features of violations of which this law is susceptible.

It was well said here by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] that, if we pass this chapter, it will be of very little concern whether the espionage chapter passes or not. Pass this chapter and make it a part of the laws of the United States, and then appoint me to the office of Postmaster General, and I will take a contract to make the freedom of the press a byword and a sneer. I will give bond to build up or ruin any business man in the United States. I will assume the obligation, if you please, to determine what class of our taxpayers shall use the mails and what class shall be absolutely excluded from them. I will make it one of the greatest engines of tyranny and of arbitrary power that can be devised by the wit of man.

Now let me ask, assuming what I have stated to be correct, whether a law capable of producing such conditions should be enacted by the American Congress in this or any other crisis? I do not think so, Mr. President. I may be mistaken, but I am one of those who believe that it is just at times like this that the fundamental limitations upon arbitrary power written into our Constitution should be observed and strengthened.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I agree with the Senator very heartily, but I want to ask him if there is not a provision in this bill for appeal from the rulings of the Postmaster General?

Mr. THOMAS. There is; but the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], when the discussion began, said that he would ask to eliminate it, because under the law as it stands the right of appeal would exist. But, Mr. President, the right of appeal is a very questionable remedy to an injured citizen. The processes of administering justice in this country are extremely expensive and exceedingly slow. The courts are crowded, and becoming more so all the time. A shrewd attorney—and there are many of them in the Government employ, which is perfectly proper—thoroughly acquainted with rules and methods of procedure, may make an appeal, however meritorious, absolutely innocuous for several years, and, unless the court graciously permits the appeal to suspend the operation of the ruling, the interval between an appeal and its final establishment may result in the absolute ruin of the man whose affairs are affected.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves that subject——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the Senator agree with me that this particular chapter and several other chapters of the bill are not for a war emergency—are not based upon war conditions—but are for all time, until repealed?

Mr. THOMAS. I called the attention of the Senate to that fact, both by a suggestion to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] when he had the floor, and since in my preliminary statement.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I was not in the Chamber at the time. Then I desire to ask a further question. Does the Senator believe that it would be possible to pass such legislation as this except under the pressure of war conditions?

Mr. THOMAS. I should dislike to believe so, Mr. President. It would be a great humiliation to me to believe that the Congress of the United States in times of peace could even be induced seriously to consider such a proposition.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. May I suggest to the Senator from Colorado that it occurs to me that in abnormal times, such as we are passing through to-day, the freedom of the press, the privilege of the newspapers to criticize the acts of officials, and make suggestions touching public questions, so that by the attrition of ideas and the friction of suggestions the eternal truth may be evolved, is more necessary than in normal times? I owe nothing to the metropolitan newspapers. They have slandered and abused me incontinently, shamefully, but I will cheerfully bear it all rather than see the freedom of the press abridged in the slightest degree. Error is short lived, and any advantage obtained by it is ephemeral so long as truth and uncircumscribed discussion are free to combat it.

Mr. THOMAS. Why, Mr. President, it seems to me that that proposition does not admit of argument; it is self-evident. During the past month I have been the subject of as much severe adverse criticism by the press throughout the country—I will not say "as much," but of a great deal; not so much as some of my associates upon this floor have been, but to an unusual degree. Such attacks are not pleasant. One's family suffers more from them than does the victim himself; one's friends are more concerned about it, especially those near and dear friends who feel, and feel keenly, their injustice; but, Mr. President, I would rather have such criticisms multiplied a thousandfold in their intensity and in their frequency than to see the press of this country muzzled by legislation which would prevent it. It is one of the evils of the freedom of the press, Mr. President, which we must bear with as much equanimity as possible, since efforts to correct it must necessarily lead to the destruction of the expression of public sentiment, without which we can not exist as a Republic.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no doubt that the Senator from Colorado had the distinction I am about to suggest in his mind when he spoke of the question of an appeal to the courts. Properly described, the process is not one of appeal. The only way by which the citizen who is aggrieved can reach the courts is to bring a bill in the proper jurisdiction asking for an injunction to restrain the Government official from doing the thing that he is about to do.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator reminds me of a legal status which had escaped me; and I notice that such is the language of section 5, to which I referred in answer to the inquiry of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN], which is virtually the same thing.

Mr. CUMMINS. That remedy to the ordinary citizen and for the ordinary case is of little or no value.

Mr. THOMAS. It is practically prohibitive. The expense of it to the ordinary man is more than he can bear.

Mr. President, when interrupted I was about to refer to what I consider the greatest forensic argument that ever fell from human lips. I refer, of course, to the argument of the Hon. Jeremiah S. Black in the Milligan case, one of the gems, if it is not the principal gem, of legal literature; a speech that deserves to rank side by side with the speeches of Daniel Webster, in which he expounded the Constitution and made sure the foundations of our Federal structure. In that argument Judge Black used this language:

> But we are answered that the judgment under consideration was pronounced in time of war, and it is therefore, at least morally, excusable. There may or there may not be something in that. I admit that the merits or demerits of any particular act, whether it involves a violation of the Constitution or not, depend upon the motives that prompted it, the time, the occasion, and all the attending circumstances. When the people of this country come to decide upon the acts of their rulers they will take all these things into consideration. But that presents the political aspect of the case, with which, I trust, we have nothing to do here. I decline to discuss it. I would only say, in order to prevent misapprehension, that I think it is precisely in a time of war and civil commotion that we should double the guards upon the Constitution. If the sanitary regulations which defend the health of a city are ever to be relaxed, it ought certainly not to be done when pestilence is abroad. When the Mississippi shrinks within its natural channel and creeps lazily along the bottom the inhabitants of the adjoining shore have no need of a dike to save them from inundation. But when the booming flood comes down from above and swells into a volume which rises high above the plain on either side, then a crevasse in the levee becomes a most serious thing. So in peaceable and quiet times our legal rights are in little danger of being overborne, but when the wave of arbitrary power lashes itself into violence and rage and goes surging up against the barriers which were made to confine it, then we need the whole strength of an unbroken Constitution to save us from destruction.

Precedents, Mr. President, are serious things in a free government. They rise inevitably to sustain or to plague us in the future; and legislation like this, finding its only possible justification in the serious conditions by which we are confronted, may prove to be the basis for other invasions of absolute power upon rights which we do not appreciate because we have enjoyed them so long—rights which were wrested from arbitrary power through centuries of struggle, of sacrifice, and of bloodshed. Let us not, Mr. President, during these serious times prove unworthy sons of worthy sires, but guard this precious heritage bequeathed to us from the founders of the Government safely through the present tide of affairs that we may deliver it without injury to those who are to come after us.

I can not, Mr. President, do otherwise than to vote against this entire chapter, believing that the consequences with which we will be menaced in the event it becomes a law are far more serious, far more formidable, and far more dangerous to American liberty than can be the things at which it is aimed and which it is designed to destroy.

RECESS.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock on Monday.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m., Saturday, May 5, 1917) the Senate took a recess until Monday, May 7, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, May 5, 1917.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Thou great Father-Soul, in whom dwelleth all wisdom, power, and goodness, impart unto these Thy servants of Thy substance; that they may be guided by wisdom, justice, equity, and truth in all the transactions of this day; that Thy will may be accomplished in them. In the Spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bill:

H. R. 2893. An act to amend section 10 of chapter 2 of the Criminal Code.

FOOD PRICES.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on food prices.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on food prices. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SLOVAK LEAGUE OF AMERICA.

Mr. RAMSEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD resolutions adopted by Branch 87 of the Slovak League of America, at Passaic, N. J., April 29, representing Bergen and Passaic Counties, N. J.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolutions are as follows:

Resolutions adopted at a mass meeting arranged by Branch 87 of the Slovak League of America, at Passaic, N. J., April 29, 1917.

In the present crisis of the Republic we, as representatives of the American people of Passaic, Wallington, Garfield, and Clifton, N. J., who are of Slovak descent, assembled to-day at a mass meeting under the auspices of Branch 87 of the Slovak League of America, at Passaic, N. J., declare to the Nation, State, and cities that the allegiance and patriotism of the Slovaks in America; to our leader, the President of the United States, Woodrow Wilson; to this our new adopted country and its unconquerable flag, is unswerving, undivided, and full hearted; and

Whereas the hearts of Slovaks in America, bleeding with pity for their unfortunate brethren who are suffering under the oppression of the cruel Austro-Hungarian Government and now are compelled to give their lives and their fortunes for the cause of their own oppressor; and

Whereas we in this free country are enjoying the priceless blessings of golden liberty for which we would look in vain in any other part of the world; and

Whereas President Wilson, in his war address to Congress on April 2, 1917, solemnly declared that our country would fight in the present world war for the "liberties of small nations" and to "make the world itself at last free"; and

Whereas the other great powers, now our allies, at war with the German Government, and practically at war with the Government of Austria-Hungary, under which we all had lived under oppression, have voiced their purpose to secure the rights and liberties of the small nations no less than of the great, and also of the Slovaks and Czechs (Bohemians): Therefore be it

Resolved, That we renew and accentuate our allegiance and loyalty to the United States of America, and that we shall support any measure that our President and Congress would deem necessary to take, and that we are ready with our lives and fortunes to support this our adopted country, to preserve her unity and freedom; and be it further

Resolved, That we express our heartfelt gratitude to our President, Woodrow Wilson, and our allies for their courageous and high stand favoring the freedom of small nations, and we assure them that our oppressed Slovak brethren under the Hungarian yoke shall never forget their gratitude as long as they live; and be it further

Resolved, That we extend our hearty greetings and welcome to the Right Hon. Arthur J. Balfour; to Gen. Joffre, the hero of the Marne; to the Hon. M. René Viviani, and the other commissioners from Great Britain and France, who are now with us in our country; and be it further

Resolved, That we send our hearty greetings and congratulations to our Russian brothers already liberated from despotism, and we pray that they may persevere in their hard and heroic struggle until final victory and help to liberate their oppressed Slavonic brothers in Austria-Hungary from oppression; and be it finally

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent to His Excellency Woodrow Wilson, the President of the United States of America, to the members of the Cabinet, and all Governments of our high allies.

JOHN MARKO, Chairman,
ADAM J. ANDRASCIK, Secretary,

Committee.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

FEDERAL RESERVE.

The SPEAKER. The House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union——

Mr. MANN. I think there should be a motion.

The SPEAKER. The other day the gentleman insisted that it was automatic.

Mr. MANN. And that was right the other day, too.

The SPEAKER. How could it be right then and wrong now?

Mr. MANN. The House then ordered consideration of it, and this time only made it in order.

Mr. GLASS. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill amending the Federal reserve act—H. R. 3673.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] was presiding when this bill was under consideration the other day, but he is absent in attendance at a meeting of the Ways and Means Committee. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] to take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 3673) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, as amended by the acts of August 4, 1914, August 15, 1914, March 3, 1915, and September 7, 1916, with Mr. FOSTER in the chair.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the pending amendment.

Mr. WINGO. As I understand it, the committee resumes consideration of the bill at the point that we reached the other day.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Let us have the amendment reported.

Mr. WINGO. Was there an amendment pending at the time the committee rose?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that there are two amendments now pending before the committee.

Mr. PLATT. There is an amendment pending, offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that there is pending an amendment by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL]——

Mr. GLASS. There is an amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] and a substitute offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN].

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first amendment, and then the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MCFADDEN: Page 6, line 10, strike out the word "seven" and insert the word "five."

Amendment by Mr. HILL: Page 6, line 9, after the word "deposit," in line 8, strike out lines 9 to 25, on page 6 and the first three lines on page 7.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT], a member of the committee.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, practically the only objection we have heard to any part of this bill has reference to this amendment to section 19 of the Federal reserve act, proposing to decrease the reserve requirements and providing that all reserves are to be in the Federal reserve banks. Country banks now are required to maintain a reserve of 12 per cent of deposits, and this amendment reduces that requirement to 7 per cent of its deposits, the whole 7 per cent to be kept in the Federal reserve bank. The present requirement of 5 per cent to be maintained in the bank's own vaults is cut out.

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] made an argument the other day on this point, taking the ground that it was entirely unsafe to allow a country bank to run without any home reserve requirement. He seemed to imply, although I know he did not mean to imply, that this act requires that all the reserve money a bank has in its vaults must be put in the Federal reserve bank vaults; that is to say, that any gold, gold certificates, or legal tender that the bank finds among its deposits must be immediately sent to the Federal reserve bank. Of course that is not true. It merely means that the only reserve that the bank is required to keep must be in the Federal reserve bank, and that is reduced from 12 per cent to 7 per cent.

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] also said that provided for an inflation. Well, potentially, it does; it provides for a further mobilization of gold upon which credit can be issued, but the Federal reserve banks are exceedingly conservatively managed; their rediscount rates are so high now that they do not attract business; they have wisely made no effort whatever to attract business; they are holding their reserve for an emergency. That is what they were created for. They are loaning money where it is needed to banks, but they are not seeking to compete with the open-market money rates for call or time loans in our financial centers. A bank in the East which owns bonds, for instance, can take its bonds to the National City Bank of New York, or to one of the other large banks there, and can borrow money from them at a lower rate than it can generally obtain of the Federal reserve bank, and that, I think, is as it should be. It shows that the Federal reserve banks can be trusted with the greater power this measure will afford them for handling any emergency that may arise during the war.

Now, if the gentleman from Connecticut thinks it is unsafe for country banks to run without reserve in their own vaults, he might move to restore the words originally written in this bill requiring each bank to keep 5 per cent of "till money" on hand. The absurdity of that position is this: If you require the reserve to be in any bank all the time, you can not use it when the emergency comes. That suggests an argument used at the time the Federal reserve act was under discussion. The old law required 15 per cent to be kept by the country banks and 25 per cent in the central reserve banks for an emergency. In order to show the absurdity of a hard and fast reserve requirement—and it was largely the reserve requirements themselves which caused the panic of 1907—this illustration was used. Suppose a hospital had 100 beds and the requirement was to hold 15 per cent in reserve for an emergency. Suppose a great railroad accident or a battle took place, and along came the ambulances filled with wounded men, and when 85 beds were filled suppose the surgeon says, "We can not open these reserve beds; they must be reserved for an emergency." But, they say, "Here is the emergency." "It does not make any difference; these beds must be held for an emergency." Whether the emergency comes or does not come, you can not use reserves which you are required by law at all times to keep, and if you put back in this bill the requirement that 5 per cent for "till money" must be kept on hand and can not be used you will really require a bank to keep at least another 5 per cent for actual use. No other country has a reserve requirement for its banks.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Who is to determine when the emergency arises under the amendment; will it be the Federal reserve bank?

Mr. PLATT. I will say that the Federal Reserve Board has authority to determine when an emergency arises and has authority to suspend, in the case of a great emergency, all reserve requirements. That is, in my opinion, one of the best provisions in the Federal reserve act.

Mr. FESS. I understand the amendment is for the purpose of mobilizing the reserves in a central authority, reserves that otherwise would be valueless.

Mr. PLATT. Not wholly valueless but much more useful if centralized.

Mr. FESS. Let me ask the gentleman what effect would it have on the local bank to require it to keep a reserve in a Federal reserve bank instead of its own bank?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks that the time of the gentleman from New York be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman's question is as to the effect of keeping the reserve in the Federal reserve bank?

Mr. FESS. Instead of in its own bank, in case of an emergency.

Mr. PLATT. I think it would be decidedly advantageous. For instance, the desire to keep all the reserve in its own banks was what in a great part caused the panic of 1907. Of course, the law at that time required a country bank to keep 15 per cent—6 per cent in its own vaults and 9 on deposit with the correspondence banks—but it permitted them to keep the whole 15 per cent in their own vaults.

When the emergency came they were all pulling on the banks in the large cities trying to get the 15 per cent in their own vaults. After the panic there was a statement showing that the country banks did have the most of the 15 per cent on hand. As a matter of fact, the banks nearly always keep more than they are required to keep, and I have in my hand the call of March 5, 1917, which shows that the banks of the country had no less than $1,109,000,000 in reserve money—more than they were required to keep by law. If you will take a bank statement from your own district and figure up what reserves they keep you will find that they almost always have way above the requirement, so that there is no necessity for requiring that they shall keep 5 per cent of the till money. They will do it anyway, and keep a good deal more as a matter of habit and good judgment. The bank statements show that they do it.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. PLATT. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. What effect would it have on the depositors of a bank to have the reserves kept in the Federal reserve bank rather than in the local bank?

Mr. PLATT. That is a good question, and I will answer it in this way: I will say, of course, that this bill does not do away with the regular examinations of the local banks. The bank examiner will call for the condition of a bank at certain times, on a certain date, and they are always for a date that has gone by. For instance, they will call on the 15th of March for the condition of a bank on the 5th of March. The local banks do not know what date they will call for, but they know it is some date that has gone by. This statement will show, as they do now, cash on hand in the banks; and the depositors reading those statements published will know not only that his money is safe and that his checks will be paid on demand, but will know that the bank has ample reserves with the Federal reserve bank. It is absolutely certain that our bankers can be trusted to keep a sufficient amount of cash on hand; but I want to say, while on the subject, that the amendment offered by my friend from Pennsylvania, Mr. McFADDEN, to reduce the reserve kept in the Federal reserve bank from 7 to 5 per cent I think would be unwise. That is going further than the banking experts recommend. It is not necessary and might cause apprehension.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I will say to my friend that he has not yet answered my question.

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman asked what effect it would have upon the depositors. The depositor reads in his newspaper, after the bank has been examined, and knows what cash it has on hand. He knows that it has more than 5 per cent, and why should it have any effect upon him?

Mr. FESS. If a man deposits in a bank, he knows that the reserves are there to take care of the deposits in case of emergency.

Mr. PLATT. But you can not use them in case of an emergency.

Mr. FESS. What is the use of placing them anywhere?

Mr. PLATT. The Federal reserve bank has got them mobilized. The member bank can obtain help from it at any time by presenting notes for rediscount. The depositor knows that. The ordinary depositor does not know anything about the reserve requirements in the banks, whether 15, 12, or 5 per cent. All he knows is it has so much cash on hand, and he will see that in the statement.

Mr. GLASS. The idea of the reserve is that the Federal reserve bank can use it when it can not be used by the local bank.

Mr. PLATT. That is true.

Mr. GLASS. That is one advantage, and another advantage is that we transform a larger part of the present required reserves from the reserve which can not be used into till money, which can be used. The reserve is a fixed quantity all the year around. Country banks now are compelled to carry 12 per cent reserves.

Mr. PLATT. And a fixed quantity of certain kinds of money.

Mr. GLASS. At varying seasons of the year, when business activities are acute, the bank for its own protection will have to carry a larger amount of till money than it would have to carry during a lax season.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman may be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNYDER. I would like to ask if it is now the purpose that only 7 per cent shall be carried as a reserve, and that carried in the reserve bank against both time and demand deposits?

Mr. GLASS. No; 3 per cent.

Mr. PLATT. Three per cent against time deposits.

Mr. SNYDER. Three per cent against time and 4 per cent against demand?

Mr. PLATT. No; seven.

Mr. SNYDER. Three and seven?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. That is little enough, in my judgment.

Mr. GLASS. It is now 12 and 5.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. PHELAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER] says that it is little enough. The banks are going to keep more than that. They are going to keep something for use.

Mr. SNYDER. Of course they are.

Mr. PHELAN. In England and in foreign countries there is no legal reserve at all. It is left entirely to the discretion of the banker. They keep over 7 per cent.

Mr. SNYDER. I appreciate that the banks will keep more than both the 7 and the 3 per cent. They must do that. A bank can not get along without any money.

Mr. PHELAN. The depositor will be absolutely taken care of.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. Did I understand that the money kept in the reserve, in the Federal reserve banks, will be carried in the statements as cash on hand?

Mr. PLATT. No; the cash the bank has in its own vault.

Mr. HUSTED. How would the money in the Federal reserve bank be carried in the statement?

Mr. PLATT. There is a special line in the statement for the reserve in the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. HUSTED. My idea was that the ordinary person in reading a statement would get the impression his bank had very little cash on hand; that he would not take into consideration the fact that this money carried in the Federal reserve bank was practically cash also.

Mr. PLATT. I do not think so. I think that the statement will show that it is a reserve and, in addition to that, it will show the cash on hand. One great advantage of this is that it allows the bank to show the cash on hand in bank notes and Federal reserve notes, whereas the old system shows only gold and gold certificates and legal tender as reserve. Every bank, if it could now count all the cash, all of its bank notes and Federal reserve notes as reserve, would show a very much larger reserve than the legal reserve shows, and when the new statements come out I apprehend the practical reserve showing will be about as it has been.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PLATT. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What is the objection to allowing or permitting or requiring the regional bank to pay 2 per cent interest on these deposits? Why do we insist upon their having it for nothing?

Mr. PLATT. I can tell the gentleman what the objection is. That would make an inducement to the Federal reserve banks to go out and get business and pay money out without regard to an emergency which might come, and it would be a very bad thing to do, in my opinion.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. How much will this 7 per cent amount to of the reserve banks? How much will be placed immediately in the original banks under this 7 per cent requirement?

Mr. PLATT. Well, for $100,000 demand deposits it will be $7,000.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; but what will be the gross amount that will be deposited in the regional banks of the country without any interest?

Mr. PLATT. I do not remember. The gentleman can see from the comptroller's statement of Saturday what it is now. I have forgotten the amount.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It will be over a billion dollars.

Mr. PLATT. Not quite that.

Mr. GLASS. Approximately $900,000,000.

Mr. PLATT. Approximately that. Now, unless somebody wants to ask me a further question, I do not care to consume further time. I hope this bill will be passed, and that the bill will not be amended from the floor.

Mr. SCOTT of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. I will.

Mr. SCOTT of Iowa. Under what circumstances may a member bank call upon the reserve bank for its 7 per cent reserve, if any?

Mr. PLATT. Under what circumstances may it call upon it——

Mr. SCOTT of Iowa. Under what circumstances can a member bank, and under what emergency, use that 7 per cent reserve, and how?

Mr. PLATT. The reserve can be intrenched upon to a certain extent, notes can be rediscounted and the proceeds placed to the credit of the borrowing member bank. If there is an emergency, the Federal Reserve Board can suspend all reserve requirements.

Mr. SCOTT of Iowa. That is all subsequent action, but it seems to me that is effectually abolishing the entire reserve as far as use by the member banks is concerned.

Mr. PHELAN. If the gentleman from New York will permit, I would state that if the member banks would use only the 7 per cent virtually the whole system will be a failure. The point is this: When the Federal reserve bank has that 7 per cent in its coffers it gives the Federal reserve bank the power to give the member bank just two and a half times as much, and the greater the power you give the Federal reserve banks to loan the greater power you give to help the member bank which wants to borrow from it, and that 7 per cent is simply the basis of the loaning power of the Federal reserve bank. It can loan a great deal more than the 7 per cent that it gets from the member banks.

Mr. SCOTT of Iowa. It ceases to be a reserve of the member banks and amounts to nothing more than a deposit of the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. PHELAN. No——

Mr. PLATT. The bank can increase its cash by rediscounting notes, if it desires to do so.

Mr. SCOTT of Iowa. It can do that with deposits of any kind.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GLASS. May I inquire how many other Members want to speak on this particular provision?

Mr. CANNON. I would like about five minutes.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, let me suggest, however, to the chairman of the committee that while I do not desire to speak there are a great many inquiries which gentlemen would like to propound.

Mr. GLASS. Only three have indicated their desire to speak. What I am trying to do is——

Mr. TOWNER. This is my thought, Mr. Chairman, that if we only give them five minutes' time gentlemen might hesitate to ask questions and use up that small amount of time.

Mr. GLASS. I do not object to an extension of time, but I want to get approximately some estimate of how much more time will be consumed on this section, which seems to be the only controverted section.

Mr. MADDEN. I think I would like about five minutes, and possibly, if my statement might meet with favor, five minutes additional.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, say 20 minutes on this side.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire about 10 minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Make it half an hour on this side, let me suggest to the gentleman.

Mr. GLASS. I will let it run, then, for a while.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I am going to ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment to this section by inserting the word "six" in place of the word "five," thus changing the proposed reserve to 6 per cent instead of 5 per cent, as provided for in my previous amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, in the consideration of the proposed amendments to the Federal reserve act now under consideration, I have no desire to impede or interfere with the adoption of most of the amendments herewith proposed. I have offered an amendment to paragraph (a) of section 19, on page 6 of the bill, regarding the reserve requirements of what is commonly termed "country banks."

This amendment which I have offered places the reserve requirements at 6 per cent of the aggregate amount of their demand deposits and 3 per cent of their time deposits, and is 1 per cent less than is proposed by the Federal Reserve Board, but which conforms to the provisions in the bill which is now in committee in the Senate.

I believe that a 6 per cent reserve is all that should be required of these country banks. It might be argued in this connection that in case of stress or a straining of general financial conditions the burden of relief to be afforded by the Federal Reserve System is to be had through the discounting of commercial paper, and the large bulk of commercial paper is available and held by banks in reserve and central reserve cities. Because of this fact these banks should carry the larger reserve to take care of these emergencies, as the country banks have a smaller quantity of paper subject to rediscount than these banks which are located in central and central reserve cities. Then, too, another argument in favor of this smaller amount of reserve requirement is the question of the ability of these country banks to make a reasonable amount of earnings. The earnings of these country banks have been seriously reduced during the last few years, and that is causing these banks considerable concern. This lessening of their earning ability has come about through the following causes: Competition, legislation, and regulations.

On the question of competition, a serious question arises in my mind as to whether any State bank or trust company has a right to enter the Federal Reserve System, which is a commercial system pure and simple, created for the purpose of handling the commercial transactions in the United States, and I say there is a serious question in my mind whether or not State banks and trust companies doing the kind of business they do, with the kind of assets they possess, their investments being mostly made in paper representing a fixed asset, or a slow paper, paper which does not liquidate itself readily, and certainly under the Federal reserve act this class of paper is not and should not be subject to rediscount. Many of these banks argue that the class of securities they hold is as good, if not better, as the basis of security back of the issuance of Federal reserve notes under the rediscounting privilege afforded by the Federal Reserve System, as is the kind of paper that is legally subject to rediscount by these banks, namely, commercial paper. It therefore is a serious thing in my mind whether any of these banks which are carrying these kinds of investments should be permitted to enter the Federal Reserve System, as I think the Federal Reserve System should adhere strictly to commercial transactions and be kept in a liquid condition at all times; and fixed investments must not be made liquid unless you want inflation

A keen competition has developed in this country between the State banks and trust companies and the members of the Federal Reserve System.

The State banks and trust companies, through favorable State legislation, have not been slow to complete, and, because of their broad charter rights, have in their operation deprived the national banks of a large part of the commercial business of the United States. These institutions were created originally as trustees to act in a fiduciary capacity to receive and administer inactive accounts, the placing of investments, and so forth, a kind of business that never was intended to be commercial. These institutions have commercialized their trust-company business, and I believe their proper functions still lie along these more conservative lines, and the commercial business they are now doing should be done by the member banks in the Federal Reserve System. If this commercial business were transferred to the Federal Reserve System there would be no question but that the Federal Reserve System would then be in a position to handle all of the commercial necessities of the country, as it would thus provide sufficient reserves and assets to permit of the rediscounting of sufficient paper to cover any emergency which might arise in this country because of commercial activities. Either this must be done or some plan must be devised to compel all of the banks of the United States to come under Federal control and supervision, or else the one-third banking power of the United States, as now represented by the Federal Reserve System, will have the burden of carrying the full stress of the commercial financial requirements in case of a crisis.

This act provides for mobilization of some $400,000,000 of gold into the 12 Federal reserve banks. This is done because the gold thus mobilized in this central reservoir will provide for an expansion in the way of rediscounts at the rate of $2.50 for every $1 of gold reserve.

I seriously question whether it is right to burden these country banks and other members of the Federal Reserve System with the full burden of carrying reserve requirements to take care of the entire banking situation in the United States, and I contend that if they do so they are standing an improper share of maintaining the stability of all the banks in the United States.

The Federal Reserve Board, realizing fully the stress and responsibility imposed on the Federal Reserve System, are offering every inducement possible, consistent with their views, for the entry of the State banks and trust companies into the system. They are trying in every way possible to remove the objections which these institutions have to the entry into the system.

I seriously question whether the Federal Reserve Board will be able to remove all of these objections unless they make some very drastic changes. Not only the member banks, but the State banks and trust companies, criticize certain features of the Federal reserve act; and it is well known that the member banks are chaffing under the law and the responsibilities and loss of sources of profit which the law now imposes.

The question of the political control of the Federal Reserve System is always manifest. The criticism of the domination and centralization under the rulings and administration of the Federal Reserve Board are also pointed out as one of the opposing features. Many students, bankers, and business men believe that the regulation of the entire Federal Reserve System should be in the hands of the Federal Reserve Board, and that all tinge of politics should be removed therefrom, and that the board should be purely a nonpartisan board and that the Secretary of the Treasury should not be ex officio chairman of the board and the Comptroller of the Currency should be subservient to the board.

I am simply attempting to point out here some of the objections which I think, from my knowledge of the situation, must be removed before any of the banks now outside of the Federal Reserve System will voluntarily enter therein.

The sources of profit which the country banks have been deprived of might be summarized as follows: Loss of former profit through circulation privilege; loss of exchange; increase of rate of interest paid on deposits because of competition with State institutions and granting of charters to banks in communities that are already properly and efficiently served by banks already established; increased cost of operation of institutions because of requirements in regard to reports, taxes, and so forth, to both State and National Governments.

In many instances to-day the net profits of many country banks have been so reduced that they are not able to pay a reasonable dividend or place a proper amount of surplus to protect the bank's depositors or stockholders against possible loss on account of bad debts being incurred. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for a minute in order that I may ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GLASS. My colleague speaks of the decrease of earnings of the member banks of the Federal Reserve System. I call his attention to the fact that the report of the Comptroller of the Currency for the last fiscal year showed that the earnings of the national banks of this country for the last fiscal year exceeded considerably the earnings of the national banks for the last 47 years.

Mr. McFADDEN. I think the gentleman is correct in that, but I think he will also find the greater portion of those earnings are made by banks located in the large centers and that the small country bank, of which I am speaking, is having serious trouble along the earning line because of the very points I have mentioned.

Mr. GLASS. If the gentleman will examine the report of the Comptroller of the Currency he will find that he gives increased earnings by States, and I think the gentleman will find, as I think I have found upon examination, that the earnings of the country banks keep quite abreast of the earnings of the banks in the largest centers.

Another thing, I do not exactly recall the figures now, but there has been much said about the country banks not having available paper for rediscount. I recall that a kindred statement was made when the Federal reserve bill was in process of consideration before the committee, and I obtained figures upon that proposition. It appeared that the country banks—that is, the banks outside of the reserve and centralized reserve cities of the Middle West alone—had $236,000,000 of paper available for rediscount at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GLASS. I will add that the earnings for the last fiscal year were 8.76 per cent on capital and surplus, which makes over 14 per cent on capitalization alone.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is that the net earnings or gross earnings?

Mr. GLASS. Net earnings.

Mr. PHELAN. If I may have just a minute, they paid dividends amounting to 10.76 per cent on their capital during the past year, and that amounts to 6.38 per cent on their capital and surplus combined. You can not say they have not any money.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with great interest, especially to the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN]. It is impossible to talk much, even if I knew 10 times what I do about banking, and it is impossible to say much in five minutes; and I suppose I will not say much. But I just want to make a statement. You may take great quantities of bankers, and if you size them up now on this regional system, the member banks, you will find in the country outside of the great commercial centers and the great industrial centers, that 95 per cent, if they are profane, violate the commandments in talking about this system. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN] at a former sitting said, when it was stated that the country banks did not have paper that met the law for rediscounting, "Oh, well, they ought to have paper or go out of business."

Mr. PHELAN. Will the gentleman yield? If he refers to me, I want to say that I did not make any such statement as that.

Mr. CANNON. It was that in substance, as I recollect it.

Mr. PHELAN. I said if they are doing business in the right way they will have that kind of paper, and I will stand by that statement. That is no criticism at all, but is a matter of fact.

Mr. CANNON. By doing business in the right way they will have the right kind of paper. Now, then, there was a State bankers' meeting in my little city last year. I went around, when the eating time came, to a banquet. There were 400 or 500 bankers there, and I talked a little while. I do not know that I talked with much sense, probably not, or with great information, but as I talked I looked around over that audience. There were a few bankers there from the larger cities. I said, "I ask you bankers here now, every one of you, who indorse this system as now provided by law to rise." I looked around and there was not a soul rose. Now, that is the way they look at it. It is not a popular system with the country banks. Now, why? First, they have not the commercial paper.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. I wish to state to the gentleman that shortly after the organization of this system two or three of the banks in my town in order to secure accommodations from the Federal reserves sent up here, and one of them got $88,000 and another got $44,000, and the Comptroller of the Currency said in a public statement that the banks of Texas could have gotten many millions.

Mr. CANNON. What is the gentleman's city?

Mr. HARDY. Corsicana, Tex.

Mr. CANNON. What paper did they have?

Mr. HARDY. I only know that they wrote me they sent paper eligible for rediscount.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely; and it was cotton paper. Now, we do not raise cotton up in Illinois.

Mr. HARDY. Pardon me, but I do not think it was cotton paper, because it was too early.

Mr. CANNON. I am speaking whereof I know. You may take the average country bank—and I speak for the Middle West—and it does not have the paper that will rediscount.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Unless I can have a little more time I will not yield to the gentleman. I will yield if I may have more time.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. I yield for a question.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois if cattle paper and corn and wheat paper is not rediscountable at these banks, and that we have an abundance of it in your district and in mine?

Mr. CANNON. Corn paper and cattle paper and wheat paper we have not to any considerable extent.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. It is all the kind we have, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; it is not all the kind we have. Now, then, the farmer in the main is a depositor; he used to be a borrower.

It is the business man in the village that is the borrower very largely, and he does not make paper that passes muster. It is not commercial paper.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Why not?

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman asks, "Why not?" Because he expects to renew it.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. CANNON. I would like to have five minutes if I yield.

Mr. TOWNER. They will give it to you. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. I would like to ask the gentleman if he thinks it will increase the popularity of this system when the declared object, as stated here in this report, is that the principal purpose of the proposed change, referring to this reserve provision, is to increase the gold holdings of the Federal Reserve System? And then the statement is made that it would add approximately $300,000,000 of gold to the present holdings of the Federal reserve banks. In other words, it would take the gold from the member banks and transfer it to the Federal reserve banks for the purpose of transferring it across the seas.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman why he did not read the succeeding sentence to show what would be the effect on the commerce of this country by that proposed concentration?

Mr. TOWNER. I am asking what effect this will have upon the people of the country in regard to the popularity of this system. I have no controversy with the gentleman on the reserve bank system.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has the floor.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Chairman, this is the condition: The country banks with their reserve deposits in the regional bank—I am speaking now of the member banks—get no interest. They get uneasy once in a while when the regional bank proposes, as they did a few months ago, that they were going to inaugurate a system that would compel these country banks, which were driven into this system, on penalty of passing in their charters, to do all their collection business for nothing, and so on, and so on. Why, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] issued a statement to the effect that if they perfected that system it would put the Democratic Party out of power.

Let me suggest that the bank on its deposits receives no interest, and I know from a number of banks in my region that I am familiar with that they keep and have kept for a year or longer—two years for that matter—from 25 to 40 and 45 per cent of available means that are not earning. Now they keep a considerable portion of those deposits with their large agents in the cities. They get 2 per cent interest. You do not get any interest from the regional bank. But this great multitude of country banks furnishes, with the reserves deposited in the regional bank, the capital, without interest and without compensation, for the benefit of whom? For the benefit of anybody of the great commercial centers.

Well, you may say, suppose you get "tight up." What are you going to do? I will tell you what we did do in 1907. We got "tight up" because our depositors in Chicago and New York and Philadelphia could not get currency. Why? Because they said you could not pay it all at once, and they issued clearing-house certificates, and any relief that we got for our country banks was through our correspondents, with whom we had deposits, by taking out full circulation, they furnishing the securities, and thereby to a considerable extent we got the money that the city banks owed us.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I would like to have a little more time.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Illinois be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I wish the Chair would try to secure a little order. The gentleman has too much competition on the floor right now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like again to request Members to cease from conversation, and the Chair would again admonish the galleries to cease conversation.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that it is the fault of the galleries. I am not complaining of the membership of the House. I do not care to use the additional five minutes, because evidently the House does not desire to hear and pursue the proposition. I do not complain. I am a Member of the House, and ordinarily when I talk I manage to have something of interest in view to command attention, but it does not seem that I have now on this subject. I am not complaining or criticizing. [Applause and cries of "Go on!"] I say I am not complaining or criticizing. When I am listening I suppose I do some talking myself when other gentlemen are addressing the House. [Laughter.]

Now, I am not here to say that this system is not useful, but I am here to say that to make it useful the great number of country banks, that are compelled to make their deposits without interest, furnish a large part and a larger part of the capital to support that system, and they get no adequate compensation. They are driven now, if they do any business at all, to keep the larger part of their deposits as they kept them prior to the original bank legislation, with banks like the City National, the First National, or the Commercial National, of Chicago, because, paying as they do, some of them 3 per cent interest in competition with the State banks, they can not afford to deposit any more than they are obliged to with the regional bank without interest, because there is a loss, and therefore they utilize the larger banks that are solvent.

Now, I would like to see this law amended by the people who do the large business in the great centers, the great industrial and commercial centers. If they want, for their protection and to carry on their business, to have this system, they should pay more to have it than they are paying.

I want to make one further statement: Most of the country banks now have full circulation. If they would retire from the system, they would have to take care of that circulation; and if they would retire by the wholesale, your 2 per cent bonds would go to 80 or 75. And what keeps them in is not a desire to stay in, but it is a desire to avoid the loss that they would meet if they would go out by the wholesale, having to sell the bonds to redeem their circulation.

Now I expect this sounds like nonsense to many gentlemen who are financial and banking experts. I am only telling it to you as I see it and as I hear it from my country bank constituency, and I think what is true with me is true with the Middle West, with nine-tenths of the country banks. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. OLNEY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the reports of the committees of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to bills of the following titles:

H. R. 13. An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 14. An act making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes.

AMENDMENT TO FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. WINGO and Mr. NORTON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will first recognize the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO], a member of the committee.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. GLASS. I hate to interrupt my colleague, but it is necessary to do so. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FOSTER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3673) to amend the Federal reserve act and had come to no resolution thereon.

TELEGRAM FROM THE CHAMBER OF DEPUTIES OF ROUMANIA (H. DOC. NO. 121).

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a telegram, in French, received from the Chamber of Deputies of Roumania, and will ask the gentleman from Louisiana, Gen. ESTOPINAL, to read it to the House.

Mr. ESTOPINAL read the telegram, as follows:

JASSY, May 5, 1917.

To the SPEAKER AND MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, Washington, D. C.:

La Chambre des Députés de Roumanie se réunissant pour la première fois après la déclaration de guerre faite par la grande République Américaine a l'Allemagne, s'empresse d'expresser a ses réprésentants ses félicitations les plus chaleureuses d'avoir accompli cet acte décisif, qui sera un puissant reconfort pour tous ceux qui sont engagés dans la lutte avec les empires de l'Europe centrale, dans les heures tragiques qu'elle traverse la Roumanie voit ses espérarces s'affermir, et ne doute pas que les efforts de tous les peuples democratiques débarrassent le monde des étreintes du militarisme allemand dans la lutte que nous soutenons poursuivons la libération de nos frères oprimés qui sont sous le jour de l'Autriche-Hongrie, et nous sommes fiers de participer en même temps aux nobles buts des grandes nations qui veulent assurer avec la liberté des peuples le respect de la dignité Roumaine du droit et de la justice.

VAGA MONTZUN.
President de la Chambre des Députes de Roumanie.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illionis [Mr. MCCORMICK] has made a translation of this telegram, which will be incorporated in the RECORD.

The translation of the foregoing telegram is as follows:

To the SPEAKER AND MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, Washington, D. C.:

The Roumanian Chamber of Deputies, meeting for the first time since the declaration of war of the Great American Republic with Germany, hastens to express to the Representatives of the American House its warmest congratulations on their having taken this decisive action, which will be a powerful reinforcement to all those who are engaged in war with the central empires of Europe.

In the tragic hours through which she is passing Roumania sees her hopes confirmed and cherishes no doubt that the democratic peoples will free the world of the yoke of German militarism. In the struggle which we are waging we see the liberation of our oppressed brothers who bear the yoke of Austria-Hungary, and at the same time we are proud to share the purposes of the great nations which wish to assure, with the freedom of the peoples, respect for the dignity of Roumania, right, and justice.

VAGA MONTZUN,
President Chamber of Deputies of Roumania.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, should not the message from the Chamber of Deputies, which has just been read, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs?

The SPEAKER. It should. The telegram and the accompanying translation are ordered referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and printed.

RECEPTION OF BRITISH COMMISSION.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as a committee to escort the British commissioners to the floor of the House the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. FLOOD; the gentleman from Maryland, Mr. LINTHICUM; the gentleman from Arkansas, Mr. GOODWIN; the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. COOPER; and, in the absence of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. PORTER, and the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. ROGERS, the next ranking members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, he appoints the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. TEMPLE. The committee will proceed to the Speaker's room, and, in accordance with the previous order, the House will stand in recess for 30 minutes.

Accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the House stood in recess.

The President of the United States entered the Executive gallery of the House and was greeted with prolonged applause and cheers.

The Chief Justice and Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States were seated in front of the Speaker's rostrum.

At 12 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m., the commissioners of the Government of Great Britain to the Government of the United States, the Right Hon. Arthur James Balfour, principal British secretary of state for foreign affairs; Gen. G. T. M. Bridges, of the British Army; Admiral Sir Dudley R. S. De Chair, K. C. B., of the British Navy; Fleet Paymaster V. A. Lawford, D. S. O. R. N.; Lord Cunliffe, governor of the Bank of England; Mr. Ian Malcolm, M. P.; and Maj. Spender-Clay, M. P., British general staff, escorted by Mr. FLOOD, Mr. LINTHICUM, Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas, Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin, and Mr. TEMPLE, entered the Hall of the House, accompanied by Sir Cecil Arthur Spring-Rice, the British ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary accredited to the United States, aids of the British officers, and the Assistant Secretary of State, Mr. Phillips, and Mr. Hugh Gibson, of the Department of State. The distinguished visitors were escorted to the Speaker's rostrum amid prolonged applause and cheers.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, I present to you the Right Hon. Arthur James Balfour, principal British secretary of state for foreign affairs. [Prolonged applause.]

REMARKS OF RIGHT HON. ARTHUR J. BALFOUR.

Mr. BALFOUR. Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen of the House of Representatives, will you permit me, on behalf of my friends and myself, to offer you my deepest and sincerest thanks for the rare and valued honor which you have done us by receiving us here to-day? We all feel the greatness of this honor, but I think to none of us can it come home so closely as to one who, like myself, has been for 43 years in the service of a free assembly like your own. I rejoice to think that a member—a very old member, I am sorry to say—of the British House of Commons has been received here to-day by this great sister assembly with such kindness as you have shown to me and to my friends. [Applause.]

Ladies and gentlemen, these two assemblies are the greatest and the oldest of the free assemblies now governing great nations in the world. The history indeed of the two is very different. The beginnings of the British House of Commons go back to a dim historic past, and its full rights and status have only been conquered and permanently secured after centuries of political struggle. Your fate has been a happier one. You were called into existence at a much later stage of social development. You came into being complete and perfected and all your powers determined, and your place in the Constitution secured beyond chance of revolution; but, though the history of these two great assemblies is different, each of them represents the great democratic principle to which we look forward as the security for the future peace of the world. [Applause.] All of the free assemblies now to be found governing the great nations of the earth have been modeled either upon your practice or upon ours, or upon both combined.

Mr. Speaker, the compliment paid to the mission from Great Britain by such an assembly and upon such an occasion is one not one of us is ever likely to forget, but there is something, after all, even deeper and more significant in the circumstances under which I now have the honor to address you, than any which arise out of the interchange of courtesies, however sincere, between two great and friendly nations. We all, I think, feel instinctively that this is one of the great moments in the history of the world and that what is now happening on both sides of the Atlantic represents the drawing together of great and free peoples for mutual protection against the aggression of military despotism. [Prolonged applause and cheers.]

I am not one of those and none of you are among those who are such bad democrats as to say that democracies make no mistakes. All free assemblies have made blunders; sometimes they have committed crimes. Why is it, then, that we look forward to the spread of free institutions throughout the world, and especially among our present enemies, as one of the greatest guaranties of the future peace of the world? I will tell you, gentlemen, how it seems to me. It is quite true that the people and the representatives of the people may be betrayed by some momentary gust of passion into a policy which they ultimately deplore, but it is only a military despotism of the German type which can, through generations if need be, pursue steadily, remorselessly, unscrupulously, the appalling object of dominating the civilization of mankind. [Applause.] And mark you, this evil, this menace under which we are now suffering, is not one which diminishes with the growth of knowledge and the progress of material civilization, but on the contrary it increases with them. When I was young we used to flatter ourselves that progress inevitably meant peace, and that growth of knowledge was always accompanied, as its natural fruit, by the growth of good will among the nations of the earth. Unhappily we know better now, and we know there is such a thing in the world as a power which can with unvarying persistency focus all the resources of knowledge and of civilization into the one great task of making itself the moral and material master of the world. It is against that danger that we, the free peoples of western civilization, have banded ourselves together. [Applause.] It is in that great cause that we are going to fight and are now fighting this very moment side by side. [Applause.] In that cause we shall surely conquer [applause], and our children will look back to this fatefull date as the one day from which democracies can feel secure that their progress, their civilization, their rivalry, if need be, will be conducted, not on German lines, but in that friendly and Christian spirit which really befits the age in which we live.

Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen, I beg most sincerely to repeat again how heartily I thank you for the cordial welcome which you have given us to-day, and to repeat my profound sense of the significance of this unique meeting. [Great applause.]

The members of the English commission took their places at the right of the Speaker's rostrum and the Members of the House were presented to them, the President of the United States accompanying the Members.

The distinguished visitors were then escorted from the Hall of the House.

AFTER THE RECESS.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker.

PRINTING OF PROCEEDINGS DURING RECESS.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the proceedings had in the Hall of the House to-day during the recess may be published in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the proceedings had during the recess in the Hall of the House be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Massachusetts rise?

Mr. TREADWAY. I desire to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing a telegram from an organization in Westfield, Mass.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The telegram referred to is as follows:

WESTFIELD, MASS., May 3, 1917.

Hon. ALLEN TREADWAY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

We, the Bohemians of Westfield, Mass., assembled at a mass meeting in the Bohemian Hall May 3, 1917, have adopted the following resolution:

"Whereas the United States of America is engaged in a war the ultimate object of which is the permanent establishment of the principle of true democracy among the civilized nations of the world; and

"Whereas true principles are those for which the Bohemian people have always been striving: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we hereby solemnly declare our hearty, undivided loyalty to the Government of the United States of America; that we offer our willing services to this country wherever and whenever the Government may call us.

"Resolved further, That copies of these resolutions be forwarded to the President of the United States, the governor of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, as well as our Representatives in Congress and the State legislature."

WILLIAM KOBERA,
Chairman of the Meeting.

AMENDMENTS TO FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3673.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3673, with Mr. FOSTER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3673, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3673) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, as amended by the acts of August 4, 1914, August 15, 1914, March 3, 1915, and September 7, 1916.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] was occupying the floor and had two minutes of time remaining.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Arkansas may proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not pretend to be a banking and currency expert, and naturally dislike to differ with the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. However, I will say to the gentleman that he is the first man I have seen since the enactment of the Federal reserve act entering the lists as a champion of the country bank, and yet at the same time frankly advocates the return to the old banking and currency system which produced the panic of 1907, to which he referred. Every argument that he has offered, and that has been offered during this debate, against the pending bill was heard upon this floor in criticism of the Federal reserve act when it was being considered by this House. It seems that there are some gentlemen in this House, as well as some bankers of this country, who have not yet caught the philosophy of the Federal Reserve System or see only the mistakes in its administration made by the Federal Reserve Board and overlook the benefits of the system, who are yet blind to the reasons of the panic of 1907 and the panics that preceded that one. There are yet some gentlemen in this House, and some bankers in this country, who measure everything connected with banking and currency by the dividends that the banker gets and exclude from consideration the protection and facilities which the Federal Reserve System affords the banker and the protection and benefits that it affords the public.

Mr. Chairman, those who framed the Federal reserve act did not do so with the view solely of providing dividends for the banks of this country, but the larger object back of the Federal reserve act was to furnish an elastic currency that would meet the expanding and seasonal needs of the commercial, industrial, and agricultural activities of the Nation and avoid the losses suffered both by the banks and the people from the panics that were the natural, logical results of our old banking and currency system. There may be some bankers who decline to carry burglary insurance because they do not receive direct dividends upon the premiums they pay.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. I would rather not yield until I have finished my statement; but as the gentleman has interrupted me, I will yield now.

Mr. MEEKER. Is it not true that the Secretary of the Treasury stated that the Federal Reserve System had nothing to do with the relieving of the panic of 1907?

Mr. WINGO. I leave the gentleman with the Secretary of the Treasury. I have never heard him say that and do not believe he said it, as there would be no reason for such a statement by him, because the Federal reserve act was not enacted until several years after the panic of 1907. I have never heard it questioned before by any man that the reasons for the panic of 1907 were those given by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] a moment ago. Let us briefly state the elements that entered into and precipitated that panic. It is a strange fact, though nevertheless true, that the panic of 1907 came at a time of the country's greatest prosperity. Under the law the banks of the country are divided into three classes—country banks, reserve city banks, and central reserve city banks. Under the old law the country banks were required to keep a certain portion of their reserves on deposit with an approved bank in one of the reserve cities. The banks of the reserve cities, in turn, were required to keep one-half of their reserves on deposit with an approved bank in one of the three central reserve cities, the greatest of which was New York. Without stopping to go into detail, it is a fact admitted by all that under that system of reserves the reserve money of the country was pyramided, and a large volume of it found its way to the banks of the city of New York. These banks were paying 2 per cent interest on these reserves, and naturally they wanted to have some returns on them, to which they had a right; and in order to get these returns they loaned out these reserves upon the only security with which they were familiar—that is, investment and speculative securities that were being dealt in on the stock exchange of New York. Each year these New York banks gradually loaned out these reserves to a greater extent, and finally in 1907 the crash came.

The gentleman will recall that at that time the country was in a prosperous condition, that we had bumper crops, and that the mills of the country were running at a greater capacity than they had ever run before. This very prosperity had caused a rising and an active market in the speculative securities upon which the New York banks had loaned these reserves, and naturally there was a great demand for this reserve money, and the loans of this character had a larger and greater volume than ever before. Bumper crops were being harvested, and in order to provide funds and credits for the harvesting of these great crops the country banks began to call in their reserves and ask for greater accommodations from the New York banks in a volume greater than their ordinary seasonal demands. What happened? The demands of the country banks occasioned by the prosperity of the country were greater than the New York banks could meet, and in order to get the funds with which to meet these demands these banks commenced calling these speculative call loans, and this caused a dumping of securities on the stock exchange market and resulted in the panic. In other words, the very prosperity of the country precipitated the panic. I say precipitated the panic, but of course it did not cause it. The underlying cause was the unsafe system that was in effect and made such conditions possible. What was the result? When the country banks called upon their correspondents in New York and the other central reserves and reserve cities for their reserve money and for rediscount privileges neither were available. And as the gentleman from Illinois well said, the banks told us that we could not get our money all at once. What was the need of the country? The bumper crops, the industrial prosperity, and the extraordinary activities and needs called for a greater volume of money, but instead of getting a greater volume of money to meet the seasonal and legitimate demands of the prosperity of the country the panic caused a shortage of current funds and caused great loss.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WINGO. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINGO. That was the cause of the panic of 1907, and I do not think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], or any other gentleman who studied the question, will doubt it; and if the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] can get the Secretary of the Treasury to make a statement to the contrary, I shall be very much surprised.

But, Mr. Chairman, let us get back to the original proposition. The gentleman from Illinois said he has been at these country bankers' banquets and that they cuss the Federal Reserve System, and that in order to express their real opinions about it I think he said he would have to use unparliamentary language and violate some of the commandments. Oh, yes; I have read some of the speeches delivered at some of these same bankers' banquets, and I suspect the gentleman from Illinois has fallen into the same error that some of the bankers did that he listened to, and that is criticizing the system itself when really their only objection went to the administration of the system. But there are some bankers in this country who still long for a return to the old system, disastrous as it proved to be; but the amusing thing about some of these speeches at some of these banquets is that in one breath they claim credit for the enactment of the Federal Reserve System, contending with great earnestness that they started the propaganda by which the banking and currency system of the country was revised, and tell how they had to drive Congress into this reform, and yet in the next breath, as the gentleman from Illinois says, they condemn the system itself.

Mr. BARNHART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BARNHART. The National Bankers' Association, after first condemning this system, have wheeled into line and now indorse it year after year, do they not?

Mr. WINGO. Oh, yes. The truth is, every intelligent banker of this country recognized that it was necessary to revise the banking and currency laws of this country. There was no dispute about that. The opposition that they offered to us in the Banking and Currency Committee and to Members of Congress was not for the purpose of preventing a revision of the banking and currency laws, but was for the purpose of trying to get something put into the system to which they were not entitled, and they used their opposition to the revision itself purely as a lever.

Mr. GLASS. I suggest to my colleague that if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] had attended the banquets throughout the country of large commercial associations and large industrial associations, he would have heard only praise of the Federal Reserve System.

Mr. WINGO. That is true; and I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that in my candid judgment—and I have talked to country bankers—every day they are beginning more and more to understand the philosophy of the banking and currency system that is embodied in the Federal reserve act, and I candidly believe that when we enact this amendment it will enable a great many State banks to come in and ultimately the majority of the State banks will join the system.

I admit there are some things in the bill that violate my ideas of what should be done, and there are some amendments I would like to have made to the bill, but I recognize that every amendment authorized in this act is in keeping with the fundamental philosophy of the Federal reserve act.

Mr. GLASS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. I will.

Mr. GLASS. I want to say to the gentleman that within the last 48 hours State banks and trust companies in the Mississippi Valley, representing resources of $75,000,000, have joined the Federal Reserve System.

Mr. WINGO. That is true. Now, before I conclude I want to discuss the reserves in detail.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Is it not a fact that 90 per cent of the criticism of the country banks grows out of the fact that they are not allowed to charge for collections?

Mr. WINGO. That is true; and I am in sympathy with the contention of the country banks that they should have the right to charge a reasonable legitimate exchange on collections to cover actual service rendered; but that is not in the bill. I offered such an amendment in the Committee on Banking and Currency and reserved the right to vote for it should it be offered on the floor. It was offered in the committee, but the chairman ruled it out of order on this bill.

Now, I want to discuss briefly the reserve question, because there seems to be a misunderstanding even among some Members of the House as to what reserves are. I want to state what constitutes reserve money, what the reserve requirements were under the old law, what the reserve requirements are under the present law, and what the reserve requirements will be if this bill becomes a law. That is information which several gentlemen have asked me to give while discussing this bill. First, what do you mean by reserves? By that is meant that each bank must keep in reserve, unused, save in certain contingencies, a sum in lawful money equal to a certain percentage of its deposits. Second, what constitutes lawful money? By lawful money is meant legal-tender money. The principal lawful money is gold coin, which, of course, is the basic money of the country; then the gold certificate, of which one class is payable to order; then clearing-house certificates, United States notes, the Treasury notes of 1890, silver dollars, silver certificates, and fractional coin. In addition to that, banks are permitted to count gold bullion bearing the assay stamp of the United States mint as reserve money. In passing it might be well to state the status of each kind of lawful money, which is as follows:

Gold coin is legal tender at its nominal or face value in payment of all debts, public and private, when the coin is not below the standard weight and limit of tolerance prescribed by law and when below such standard weight and limit of tolerance it is legal tender in proportion to its weight. Being standard money, gold coins are not redeemable.

Gold certificates are not legal tender but are receivable for all public dues, and when so received may be reissued; and they may be held by Federal reserve and national banks as lawful reserve. Gold certificates are receipts for actual deposits of gold in the Treasury and are redeemable in gold coin by the Treasurer and all assistant treasurers of the United States.

Standard silver dollars are legal tender at their nominal or face value in payment of all debts, public and private, without regard to the amount, except where otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract. Being standard money, standard silver dollars are not redeemable.

Silver certificates are not legal tender, but, like gold certificates, they are receivable for all public dues, and when so received may be reissued; and they may be held by Federal reserve and national banks as lawful reserve. Silver certificates are receipts for actual deposits of standard silver dollars in the Treasury and are redeemable in such dollars only.

Treasury notes of the act of July 14, 1890, are legal tender for all debts, public and private, except where otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract. They are redeemable in United States gold coin or in standard silver dollars at the option of the holder by the Treasurer and all assistant treasurers of the United States. When received by the Treasurer they are cancelled and replaced by silver certificates.

United States notes (also known as "green backs" and "legal tenders") are legal tender for all debts, public and private, except duties on imports and interest on the public debt. Upon the resumption of specie payments, January 1, 1879, these notes were accepted in payment of customs dues and have been freely received on that account since, though the law has not been changed. They are redeemable in United States gold coin in any amount by the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States, and when received are reissued.

Subsidiary silver coins are legal tender for amounts not exceeding $10 in any one payment. They may be presented in sums or multiples of $20 to the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States for redemption or exchange into lawful money.

I might also, in passing, give the legal status of the Federal reserve notes and national bank notes, which is as follows:

Federal reserve notes are not legal tender, but are receivable by the Government for all public dues, and are receivable on all accounts by all Federal reserve banks, national banks, and other banks members of the Federal Reserve System. They are redeemable in gold coin of the United States by the Treasurer, and in gold or lawful money by any Federal reserve bank. Federal reserve bank notes are identical in all their attributes with national bank notes.

National bank notes are not legal tender, but are receivable for all public dues except duties on imports, and may be paid out by the Government for all purposes except interest on the public debt and for redemption of national bank notes. They are redeemable in lawful money of the United States by the Treasurer, but not by the assistant treasurers, and are also redeemable at the bank of issue.

Now, having stated what constitutes reserves and what moneys may be counted as reserves under the law, let us see what amount of reserves was required under the old law, the present law, and also under the pending bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. WINGO. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. WINGO. But, before I undertake to show the amounts of the different reserve requirements, it might be well to explain the different classifications of banks: National banks are divided into three classes—country banks, reserve city banks, and central reserve city banks. I will not stop to give the statutory definition of the different classes but will simply say that the country banks are the banks of the country towns; the reserve city banks are the banks in the reserve cities, of which cities there are 52; the central reserve city banks are those banks in the three central reserve cities. Under the old law the country bank was required to keep a reserve of 15 per cent. Of that amount they were required to keep 6 per cent in their own vaults and 9 per cent in an approved bank in one of the reserve cities——

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PLATT. They were allowed to keep in the reserve cities but were not required to.

Mr. WINGO. Yes; they were allowed to; and they could keep it at home, though they were required to keep as much as 6 per cent in their own vaults. That is, three-fifths of the reserve might consist of balances due the bank by approved banks in the reserve cities.

Mr. PLATT. Sometimes they had one plan and sometimes another.

Mr. WINGO. Yes; that is true, but I am trying to give the reserve requirements and the percentages and where such reserves might be kept so that Members may have a clear idea of these requirements.

The banks in the reserve cities had to keep on hand 25 per cent of the deposits, one-half of which they were required to keep in their own vaults, and the remainder they might have on deposit with approved banks in a central reserve city. The banks in the central reserve cities were required to keep on hand in lawful money 25 per cent of their deposits.

Having given the reserve requirements under the old law, let us see what the reserve requirements of the present Federal Reserve System are. It will be seen that by the Federal reserve act we lower the reserve requirements considerably. Under the present law, that is, the Federal Reserve System, the country banks are required to keep on hand as a reserve an amount of lawful money equal to 12 per cent of their deposits. Of this amount—I am giving you the figures as the law will be in November of this year, when the reserves are finally shifted under the new law. Of that 12 per cent they will then be required to keep at least 4 per cent in their own vaults, 5 per cent with the Federal reserve bank, and the remaining 3 per cent either in their own vaults or in the Federal reserve bank.

The reserve city banks under the present law are required to keep on hand as a reserve lawful money to an amount equal to 15 per cent of their deposits. Of this amount they are required to keep 5 per cent in their own vaults, 6 per cent with the Federal reserve bank, and 4 per cent they are permitted to keep in their own vaults or with the Federal reserve bank.

Under the present law banks of the central reserve cities are required to keep on hand in lawful money an amount equal to 18 per cent of their deposits, of which 6 per cent must be kept in their own vaults, 7 per cent with the Federal reserve bank, and the remaining 5 per cent either in their own vaults or with the Federal reserve bank.

Now, under the pending bill the country banks are required to keep a 7 per cent reserve, the reserve city banks a 10 per cent reserve, and central reserve city banks a 13 per cent reserve, and in each instance these reserves must be kept with the Federal reserve bank.

To recapitulate, under the old law the country banks were required to keep 15 per cent reserves, under the present law they are required to keep 12 per cent reserves, and under the pending bill they would be required to keep only 7 per cent reserves. Reserve city banks under the old law were required to keep 25 per cent reserves, under the present law they are required to keep 15 per cent reserves, while under the pending bill they will be required to keep only 10 per cent reserves. Central reserve city banks under the old law were required to keep 25 per cent reserves; under the present law they are required to keep 18 per cent reserves, while under the pending bill they will be required to keep only 13 per cent reserves.

[At this point the committee rose, as the time had arrived under the previous order of the House to receive the British commission. After the reception of the British commission, and the recess for that purpose, the House again resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3673. After the Clerk of the House, by direction of the Chairman, had reported the bill, the following proceedings were then had:]

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] was occupying the floor, and had two minutes of time remaining.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Arkansas may proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] and the committee, but I shall not use all of the time. I do not now recall exactly the point I was discussing when the committee rose for the purpose of receiving the British commission, but I think I had finished a recapitulation or a comparison of the reserves under the old law, the present existing law, and what they would be under this bill. From what I stated before the committee will understand that we propose a further reduction of the reserves by reducing the reserves to 7 per cent for the country banks, 10 per cent for the reserve city banks, and 13 per cent for the central reserve cities, and this bill would require all of these reserves to be kept with the Federal reserve bank of the district in which the member bank is located, and it is this requirement to which opposition has arisen. If those who oppose this requirement will compare the reserves required by this bill to be kept with the Federal reserve bank, with the reserve requirements of the old law, or even with the present law, they will readily see that we have reduced materially the amount of money that banks are required to keep tied up in reserves. But it is contended that these reserves draw no interest. That is true, but under existing law after next November they would not be permitted to collect interest; so, as a matter of fact, this bill does not change the law on that point. Another objection that is offered to this bill is that the banks are not required to keep any reserves at all in their own vaults. The bill as originally written and presented to the Committee on Banking and Currency required the country banker to keep as till money an amount equal to 5 per cent of his deposits, but this provision was cut out in the Committee on Banking and Currency because it was useless and unnecessary and injected into the law an unheard of requirement without any necessity therefor, the committee recognizing the fact that each banker of necessity will keep sufficient money in his till to meet his current daily needs. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] called attention to the great volume of excess reserves now held by the banks of the country. That is true, but it does not indicate what some gentlemen seem to think, but to the practical man it indicates very clearly that the banks of this country believe that it is necessary for them to carry higher reserves than the law requires; so, as a matter of fact, we find the banks imposing a greater burden upon themselves than the law places upon them. If they wish to carry excessive reserves they may do so under this bill, the only compulsory requirements in it being that they must keep a certain amount of reserve funds with the Federal reserve bank.

Another objection is that while we reduce the total amount of reserves, the amount that is required to be kept with the Federal reserve bank is a 2 per cent increase over the requirements of the present law. Personally I have doubted the necessity for this increase, but the Federal Reserve Board and others, who have considered the question, suggested a necessity which appeals strongly to those who would recognize existing conditions with reference to our gold supply, and who see the necessity for its proper mobilization and governmental control over it. This bill, if enacted, will effect a mobilization of a greater volume of gold in the Federal reserve banks. It is thought that practically the entire increase in reserves will ultimately be in gold, and that by this increase the gold holdings of the Federal reserve banks will be increased to an estimated $354,000,000. These increased gold holdings by the Federal reserve banks will serve two purposes, whether you agree that they are necessary for the safety of the country or not. One of these purposes will be that by this increased holding in gold the Federal reserve banks will have a greater volume of gold for reserves against Federal reserve note issues, and that by this the rediscount privileges of the Federal reserve banks combined will be increased to approximately $1,000,000,000. The other purpose to be served will be the mobilization of the gold of the country, or rather a controlling volume of it, in the hands of the Federal reserve banks, and these banks being under the control of a Government board the controlling volume of the country's gold will thereby be placed under Government supervision, and its outflow can be directed along practical and necessary lines and so safeguarded as to protect the commerce and welfare of the entire country. You ask how this will be done? You ask what is the necessity of taking the gold away from the country banks and mobilizing it in the hands of the Federal reserve banks? I in turn ask you what service is the gold now lying in the vaults of the country banks rendering to the Nation, to its banking system, or to its commerce? With the exception of the Pacific slope you do not have gold in ordinary circulation.

The increase in the gold holdings of this country since the beginning of the war and its probable outflow at the conclusion of the war is a question that very properly gives serious concern not only to the bankers of the country but also to every citizen of the country, because the handling of that gold all agree will affect the commerce and welfare of the country. One of the controlling forces of high prices is the increased volume of gold in the country. Since the beginning of this war the gold holdings of the United States have been so increased that this country controls over one-third of the gold in the world. We want to control the outflow of that gold so it will go out for legitimate purposes and in such a way as to not unsettle business and disturb the economic welfare of the Nation.

I am not afraid of the outflow of gold if it goes out for legitimate purposes, and in a steady, well-directed, and legitimate way; but suppose we leave our surplus gold scattered over the country, lying idle in the vaults of the different banks, then I ask you what control can be exercised over it? Other nations have undertaken to solve this problem, and we should profit by their experience. We should not only profit by their experience, but we should so control our gold supply as to protect us against the controlling and preventive measures that other nations have resorted to. How is the outflow of gold controlled in England, France, and Germany? If there is an extraordinary outflow of gold from England in such an abnormal way and under conditions that disturb trade and prices in the British Empire, the Bank of England raises the discount rate, checks the outflow, and reduces it to a normal, legitimate flow. In the other nations the same method is employed, and in each of these nations a controlling volume of their gold is under control. By mobilizing the controlling volume of the gold of this country in the hands of the Federal reserve banks, the Federal Reserve Board can resort to the same measures that other countries resort to, if they attempt to draw from us our gold supply for other than legitimate normal actual needs. I will repeat that this gold question is one that causes deep concern to every thoughtful man. Since the beginning of the war every nation on earth has striven to mobilize its gold and gather from other nations what it could. The result of these efforts is that while the gold reserves of England and France and our other allies have increased by an estimated 18 per cent during the last three years, Germany, shut in as she is from the rest of the world, has increased her gold holdings to 115 per cent. That is significant, is it not? I will not undertake to burden the committee with a discussion of this significance, but I ask you if it is not well, in view of these facts, for this Nation to mobilize its gold, so as to have it under proper control? Any man who has studied the question knows that the fluctuation of gold is one of the greatest determining factors in the fluctuation of prices. If we do not prepare against the day that is coming, and our gold should be suddenly drawn from us, there necessarily will come a sudden contraction of credits, and with this contraction of credits and the industrial depression that would follow in this country, the country banker would be affected as deeply as any other class of citizens of this country, and for what reason, he has a vital interest and will benefit by the things that we seek to do by this bill. I believe that those who study the question recognize that their welfare is wrapped up in the general welfare, and will take the broader view, and will see that the reserve requirement of this bill, instead of being a hardship, is a security against unsettled conditions, which if permitted to come by a sudden contraction of their credit and currency the disaster would fall heavily upon them and their depositors.

Mr. FESS. The balance of trade during the war has been so enormous that England could not control the flow of gold to this country. Now, in case after the war is over the balance of trade starts in the other direction instead of in this direction, have we any power under this Federal reserve act to control or to prevent it going out to settle balances?

Mr. WINGO. Not for legitimate and proper purposes, such as in the settling of actual and usual balances growing out of trade transactions where we get value received together with profit. I am not one of those who are afraid of our gold going out as long as we get value received for it, and it goes out in such a normal legitimate way as not to cause a sudden contraction of credits in this country. One way I will suggest to the gentleman by which we can control it is through the discount rate and by the establishment of branches of our Federal reserve banks in foreign countries.

Mr. FESS. I wanted to say that the gentleman's statement that Germany had prevented the gold from going out of the country even at a time when she is under great stress is interesting to me. But is it not true that Germany has not been buying from other countries?

Mr. WINGO. Yes; that is true, but I fear the gentleman did not get my point. In speaking of the mobilization of gold in the German Empire I referred to her governmentally controlled banking institutions, which have increased their gold holdings 115 per cent since the war started, whereas the average increase of gold holdings of the controlled and central banks of the allies has been only about 18 per cent. I think the real reason for the normal increase of our allies has been that we have drained them of their gold in payment of supplies they have been buying from us. In other words, we have taken this gold in the settlement of the balance of trade in our favor.

Mr. FESS. What I wanted to ask was whether the gentleman had looked into the fact as to how Great Britain could buy, say, $2,500,000,000 of products from us beyond what she sold and yet transfer to this country only about three-quarters of a billions dollars gold. How was that done?

Mr. WINGO. Well, I shall not undertake to go into detail as to my opinion as to that, but let me suggest these facts to the gentleman for his reflection, and possibly he can answer his own question. Since the war started we have not only gotten from the rest of the world gold in great volume but we have also rebought a great volume of our securities that were held in England and France, so that these two items combined—that is, gold and our own securities which we have drawn from our allies—amount, according to one estimate that I have seen, to over $5,000,000,000. Let me suggest that after the war is over and before we return to our relative positions occupied by us commercially and financially before the war, the balance of trade against us must exceed $5,000,000,000. In other words, before we get back to the position that we occupied relatively before the war, the balance of trade must go against us to a volume that we need not fear, and the only real fear is our gold supply will be drawn upon by the other nations not through the regular legitimate trade channels or in the settlement of commercial balances but by sudden movements caused by a manipulation of exchange, which would unsettle industrial conditions in this country, and which it is thought can be avoided by mobilizing our gold and directing its use at home and its outflow to other countries along legitimate lines.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Is it not a fact that writers to-day contend that at the end of this war the nations now at war will make spasmodic efforts to recoup themselves with gold?

Mr. WINGO. Yes; that necessarily will happen.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. FESS. About what proportion of American securities that have been held by the Governments of the allies has been mobilized and turned in?

Mr. WINGO. I regret that I can give the gentleman no estimate on that. But I wish to conclude, Mr. Chairman, because I have taken more time than I intended. I wish to repeat that the philosophy of the Federal Reserve System is not based solely upon its profit making. It was intended by the creation of that system primarily to prevent the recurring panic conditions that grew out of the old system of reserves and the unseen private control of the banking facilities of this country. In other words, it was intended that the Federal reserve act should be what its name indicated—primarily a system for safeguarding, mobilizing, and directing along proper legitimate lines the bank reserves of the country; and those gentlemen who are opposed to requiring the member banks to keep their reserves with the Federal reserve banks wish to have the play Hamlet, with Hamlet left out. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I doubt whether I have anything of great value to contribute to the general knowledge on this question, but what I have to say shall be chiefly on the question of taking the reserves out of the member banks and putting them into the reserve banks.

The doing of that ought not to create any uneasiness anywhere, for these reasons: Those reserves will have to be maintained somewhere, and the wisdom in this case seems to compel the conclusion that the safe place to keep them is where they can best be utilized. If we assume that we have 9,000 member banks—and I do not know just how many we have—we will have 9,000 units endeavoring to make loans on the basis of the reserves which they hold in their vaults. Everybody can see that in a case of emergency they could not utilize all their resources to make loans to the best advantage if the reserves were held by the member banks, whereas in cases of an emergency, such as may arise during the present year, if all these reserves are held where they can be controlled and directed by the Federal Reserve Board, it is easy to understand that we can expand the credit of the country to the extent that the Federal reserve banks are allowed to loan on the basis of the reserves, namely, $2.50 to every $1 of reserve.

The proposition now is to take over about $350,000,000 of reserves in the member banks and place them in the reserve banks, and to enable the Federal reserve banks to rediscount paper on the basis of 2½ to 1, which will make in the neighborhood of an extra billion dollars of credit that can be assembled at once.

Of course, it can not be assumed that the banks themselves would not be able to make loans against the reserves if they were held in their vaults, but it must be agreed that they could not assemble all their reserves and extend the credits on the basis of the amount of the reserves that are held by a number of institutions in the same way they can be assembled if they are under the control of the Federal Reserve Board. We are going to have to use a whole lot of money, and we have got to have credit where we can assemble it; and there is no means on earth by which we could be certain that we are going to be able to meet the situation except by placing these reserves under the control of the Federal Reserve Board in the Federal reserve banks. It is not going to impose any hardship on the banks to turn over 2 per cent more of their reserves than they are now turning over, because it only means to a bank that has $9,000.000 of deposits $180,000. It will be on that basis with respect to all other banks, and to say that the banks themselves will not have the means by which they can take care of their customers is beside the question, because they will be allowed to have free money in their vaults for use in making loans, whereas if they held the reserves in the banks they could not use those reserves to make loans at all. They could not use the money. It does not take any loaning power away from the banks to turn it over to the reserve banks, because they could not use that money themselves under any circumstances. It would have to remain in their vaults. It does not embarrass the banks at all, but it does facilitate the extension of credits at a period when we may need the credits more than we have ever needed them before. We have a war on our hands. We will need money, and if the Federal reserve banks are permitted to carry the reserves they will have the power by the amount of the reserves to extend the credit two and a half times beyond that. To say that the banks are not to be permitted to collect interest on those reserves is only to say that they are doing to-day what the banks would have to do on the 1st of next November anyhow. Is not that true, I will ask the chairman of the committee?

Mr. GLASS. I will say to the gentleman that it is worse than that. Under existing law after the 17th of next November the country banks will have a reserve of 12 per cent tied up, on which they may draw no interest, instead of 7 per cent, as under this proposed bill.

Mr. MADDEN. That is true. This reduces their reserves from 12 per cent to 7. They are already obliged to carry 5 per cent of their reserves in the Federal reserve banks, and we are only increasing the amount 2 per cent.

Mr. PLATT. As a matter of fact, a good many of them are voluntarily carrying 7 per cent and more, too, in the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course. They will carry it anyhow. They do not need this reserve in the small banks of the country, and this question is too big a question to be considered on the basis of what the profit of a particular bank is going to be.

Mr. HARDY. On 2 per cent.

Mr. MADDEN. As long as we are doing no serious injury to the banks, the thing to be considered is the best interests of the country, and we are not doing any serious injury to the banks; but, on the contrary, we are establishing a policy which, in my judgment, must inevitably lead to the conclusion that credits are to be established on a firmer basis than they ever have been before.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I am thoroughly in accord with this act, and would not undertake to discuss it if it had not been for what has been said in regard to the dissatisfaction of the bankers with the Federal Reserve System. I know that it is very easy, when men's financial interests are involved, to arouse some feeling of dissatisfaction upon particular details of legislation, and unfortunately that is especially easy to do when the thing takes on in any way a political complexion; but I will venture to say that there has never been a law of the magnitude of this law and the far-reaching effect of this reserve banking act which has gone into operation with less jar, with less hardship, and with less dissatisfaction, either by the people directly affected or the community at large, than this reserve banking act. It has been a pronounced and an unequivocal success. It has stood the strain under the most remarkable circumstances of our country. From repeated conversations with city bankers who are directly affected by this, and with country bankers also, I venture to say that there is not anywhere a sentiment for a return to the old system. They are all in favor of the continuance of the Federal Reserve System. Where complaints are made at all, they are the natural complaints of men who feel that in some way their financial interest might be bettered by a particular change; and we must take that sort of complaint into consideration and give it what weight it is entitled to and no more.

Gentlemen must not forget that this system is what it is denominated to be—a reserve system. They must keep their minds always upon the idea that the great principle involved in this bill is to make our bank reserves really answer the purpose of reserves. Now, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] pointed out very clearly, I thought, the cause of the disgraceful and inexcusable panic of 1907. If I were disposed to engage in any political discussion this would be a very apt opportunity to do so. I think that panic was inexcusable, disgraceful, and ought not to be repeated in this country. It was caused by the fact that the so-called reserves of the banks in those days were not reserves at all. They did not answer the purpose of reserves. Now, I know there were some banks in my part of the country, especially country banks, which had been in a certain family for a very long time, and were very sound and reputable and solid, and they prided themselves upon paying dollar for dollar over their counters all during that panic, when city banks were giving out clearing-house certificates or refusing to pay. I know of a few country banks of that kind, and naturally they were very proud of what they did. Yet let us consider for a moment what it meant to a country bank to be in a position to do that. It meant that it must have reserves in its vault far beyond what was necessary or profitable for any bank to carry in its vaults. If a bank wishes to do that, to restrict its earning power and restrict its service to the community to the extent of carrying undue reserves in its vaults, it may be able to withstand the stress and the run of critical times; but this reserve system is to avoid the inconvenience to the country banks and the inconvenience to the community that such a course of procedure involved. I take it when a bank keeps its money in its vaults in order that it can say that it is able at any time when suddenly called upon to do so, to pay over its counter dollar for dollar of every demand that may be made upon it by depositors, it is not fulfilling its full function to the community. This Federal Reserve System is designed so that the reserves shall be actually on hand to answer the purpose of reserves in time of stress, and there is no way in which it can be done except by the Federal Reserve System. That is agreed upon by the banks, and certainly it is agreed by the business men and public who are benefited by it.

If a bank carries any portion of its reserve in a sister bank, it may occasionally go to that bank and get favors in the way of advances of cash or rediscounts. It may, but that depends upon the ability of the bank that carries the reserve to answer those demands. That is the first contingency. In the time of the panic of 1907 the big city banks were not able to answer these demands. Those that were able to help the small banks must necessarily play favorites. They necessarily favored some country banks among their correspondents and refused other country banks. That was within my knowledge. I know that some country banks came in and got advance currency to meet the stress, and others were refused. That was a discrimination not only among the banks but among the communities served by such banks. Under these circumstances the bank can now be absolutely sure that when it goes to seek a rediscount it is entitled to it as a matter of law. It does not cast any reflection on the credit of the bank to ask for a rediscount; it is asked for to serve the community it undertakes to serve.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. NORTON. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman if I can have some of that time.

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, I want a minute to ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD page 1 from the Annual Report of the State of the Finances of the Treasury Department, December 19, 1914, which will make it clear to the House that the gentleman from Arkansas and myself in a colloquy were talking about two different propositions. I maintain that the point I made at that time in regard to the Federal Reserve System will be sustained by this report. I further wish to say that the italics which appear in the report will be my own. However, the paragraphs italicized constitute a part of the report.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the extract he speaks of. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. How long is the extract?

Mr. MEEKER. Just one page.

Mr. WINGO. The extract that the gentleman wishes to insert shows that the quotation that the gentleman referred to in the colloquy was in reference to the conditions in 1914 and not 1907.

Mr. MEEKER. Yes; the Federal Reserve System.

The extract is as follows:

ANNUAL REPORT ON THE FINANCES—THE EUROPEAN WAR CRISIS.

The outbreak of the European war precipitated many grave problems. International credits and exchanges were completely disorganized, ocean transportation was for a time partially paralyzed, the entire business and economic structure in this country was shaken to its foundations, and a catastrophe of calamitous proportions was narrowly averted. It is a tribute to the economic strength and soundness of the country and to the patriotism of its people in every class and walk of life that the shock has been so admirably withstood. A panic of cataclysmic proportions might easily have resulted, and, if it had, the injury to the country would have been incalculable and many years would have been required to overcome its effects. Through the prompt and effective action of the Treasury Department and with the cordial and intelligent cooperation of the banking and business interests of the country, the danger has been averted. Confidence has been restored and specie payments have been maintained in the face of the world. At no time since the war broke out has there been, to the knowledge of this department, with the exception of a few isolated cases, a failure on the part of any solvent national bank to honor its checks in currency or money or to meet its obligations. The general revival of business throughout the country is the best evidence that confidence has been restored. Interest rates have come down from the high level to which apprehension had lifted them, restriction of credits has disappeared, foreign exchange has reached a normal basis, and a feeling of optimism pervades the business world. There is every reason why the country should look to the future with confidence, so far as its trade, commerce, and industry are concerned. This has been accomplished notwithstanding the fact that the Federal Reserve System authorized by the act of December 23, 1913, was at that time only in process of formation, and was therefore unable to render any service in the situation.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I would not occupy the time of the committee at all in this matter if it were not for the statements made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

I want to say that from the beginning I have had a great deal of confidence in the Federal Reserve System, and at the present time I am in favor of any amendment that will liberalize or improve that system, and I believe the amendment proposed here to section 19 will do that.

I live in a section of the country the interests of which are much the same as those of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. I represent a large farming community, and I can say to this House that this system already has been of very great direct and indirect benefit to my section of the country. I must say, to be candid, that when this system was under consideration in this House a large majority of the bankers of North Dakota were opposed to the system. I believe that was true also of the bankers of Minnesota, our adjoining sister State. At that time I talked personally with some of the most prominent bankers of North Dakota and Minnesota, and many of them were then bitterly opposed to the proposed Federal Reserve System. Within the past month I have talked with some of the largest and most influential bankers of Minneapolis and St. Paul, and almost to a man they have expressed the opinion that the Federal Reserve System has already proven to be a great success.

Within the past month I have talked with the president of a bank in the west central portion of the United States that has on deposit more than $15,000,000. When the Federal reserve act was under consideration in the House he was bitterly opposed to it. But recently he stated to me that his bank intended soon to avail itself of the advantages of the system by discounting some of its paper, and that he thought the Federal Reserve System was a bulwark of strength for the business interests of the country. It has been frequently urged by way of criticism that the Federal Reserve System is not a profit-making system. Now, that may or may not be true; but I do not understand that it was organized primarily as a profit-making proposition. It was organized to give better and safer banking services and facilities to the people of the country. I know as far as my section of the country is concerned that it is to-day doing that to a large extent. The small banks of the Northwest are able to-day to receive, and are receiving, better accommodations from the larger correspondent banks with which they do business than they ever have before. Depositors, borrowers, and small as well as large banking institutions throughout the Northwest have benefited greatly, directly and indirectly, on account of the establishment of this system.

The system as it operates in the Northwest makes it easier and safer for the country banks to do business; it enables the country banker as well as the city banker to sleep better nights. The country banker and the city banker knows that if there is a sudden and heavy demand for loans from the customers of his bank, as has occurred in times past, he has somewhere to go where he can with absolute certainty secure money by rediscounting the securities in his bank. The large bankers in Minneapolis and St. Paul I know feel safer in the banking business to-day under this system than they ever did under the old national banking system.

Mr. ROSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORTON. Certainly. I shall be happy to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ROSE. The gentleman made the statement that the country banks in time of stress knew where they could go and get their money. About how long does it take for a country bank to receive that aid from one of the Federal reserve banks?

Mr. NORTON. It does not take the country banker any longer to-day to receive proceeds of rediscounts directly or indirectly from the Federal Reserve System than it took him to receive loans from his correspondent banks in the most prosperous times in the past under the old national banking system.

Due to increased farming operations, there is a great demand for money now throughout the Northwest from the larger city banks. In fact, such a demand has, as I suggested a few moments ago, caused the larger banks to do something that they never expected to be obliged to do, and that is to borrow from the Federal reserve banks. There is such an elasticity in the Federal system that it permits member banks by rediscounting their securities to provide the money at once for the going and growing business of the country. I can not concur in the attempted general criticism of the system made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN], which, without objection, the Clerk will again report.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the substitute offered by Mr. MCFADDEN.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the substitute was rejected.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, do I understand that the amendment offered by myself is now pending?

The CHAIRMAN. It is. The Chair begs to state to the gentleman from Connecticut that debate has been closed by unanimous consent.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, as I stated the other day, I am in favor of this bill with this section with regard to the reserve stricken out. As I said the other day, this section is directly and distinctly antagonistic to the interests of the country banks. I would not plead for striking it out upon that ground alone, but I go still further than that and claim that in the ultimate reach of this amendment it is far more detrimental and will be to the whole country than simply to the country banks now. As I understand this proposition, its purpose is to draw into the control of the Federal Reserve System practically all of the gold of the country, and if I am wrong in that statement I wish the chairman of the committee would correct me. I understand that to be the primary purpose of the amendment.

Mr. GLASS. I think the gentleman is totally mistaken about that.

Mr. HILL. That is the way I understand it. The purpose of this amendment is to draw into the Federal Reserve System practically all of the gold of the country, and against that gold so taken into the Federal Reserve System to issue Federal reserve notes. The weekly reports of the Federal Reserve System are made on Saturday. I have not had time to examine the papers this morning, but I venture the statement now that if you will look at the New York papers, you will find there is being pumped into the circulation of this country paper money to the extent of about a million dollars a day.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? I call his attention to the fact that the proposition he suggests was voted down in the committee. It was in the original bill.

Mr. HILL. The effect of this amendment of lowering the reserves to 7 per cent and requiring that they all shall be placed in the Federal reserve banks will be just as I have stated. What will be the ultimate result? By-and-by, when this war is over, you will find a great volume of paper money in the circulation of the United States based on gold. The Federal Reserve Board are issuing it now at about a hundred per cent gold as against 100 per cent paper. The law simply requires 40 per cent. When the draft comes on this country to maintain our gold reserve and preserve the balance of trade, in view of the rapidly increasing importations into this country and the dead certainty that the flood will come with double volume after the war is over, when the factories of Germany and Austria and the rest of the central powers are thrown open, and the stoppage of war supplies compels and forces activity in the production of articles for peace in the allied countries, then that gold will go down to the point of 40 per cent reserve and we will find this country flooded with a volume of paper money in its effect no more and no less than if it were greenbacks, and this circulation is being pumped in for the purpose of maintaining flush times then under an inflated system of currency and preventing perhaps—perhaps—a cataclysm by-and-by. I would prevent it by holding the gold, if necessary, in the banks of the country rather than paper money and making our own goods, where possible, here under protective duties on competing products. Now, I make that statement unqualifiedly, and I must go to the committee meeting now. I thank you for the privilege of letting me speak. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut.

The question was taken, and the chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 13, noes 34.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That section 14, subsection (e), of the act be amended and reenacted so as to read as follows:

"(e) To establish accounts with other Federal reserve banks for exchange purposes and, with the consent or upon the order and direction of the Federal Reserve Board and under regulations to be prescribed by said board, to open and maintain accounts in foreign countries, appoint correspondents, and establish agencies in such countries wheresoever it may be deemed best for the purpose of purchasing, selling, and collecting bills of exchange, and to buy and sell, with or without its indorsement, through such correspondents or agencies, bills of exchange (or acceptances) arising out of actual commercial transactions which have not more than 90 days to run, exclusive of days of grace, and which bear the signature of two or more responsible parties, and, with the consent of the Federal Reserve Board, to open and maintain banking accounts for such foreign correspondents or agencies. Whenever any such account has been opened or agency or correspondent has been appointed by a Federal reserve bank, with the consent of or under the order and direction of the Federal Reserve Board, any other Federal reserve bank may, with the consent and approval of the Federal Reserve Board, be permitted to carry on or conduct, through the Federal reserve bank opening such account or appointing such agency or correspondent, any transaction authorized by this section under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the board."

Mr. MCFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, section 8 of this bill provides for the establishment in foreign countries of branches for exchange purposes under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Federal Reserve Board, and makes it lawful for Federal reserve banks to maintain accounts in foreign countries, appoint correspondents and establish agencies in such countries wheresoever it may be deemed best for the purpose of purchasing, selling, and collecting bills of exchange, and so forth, arising out of actual commercial transactions. Branches have now been established in London and Paris.

The authority vested in this section establishes a new precedent as regards foreign exchange business in this country, and I believe that if this section is adopted and placed in the law, and I believe it should be, that the Federal Reserve System will eventually do all of the foreign exchange business that is now being done by private international banking institutions.

The handling of this foreign exchange business under the Federal Reserve System is a tremendously important step and will add greatly to the prestige of the Federal Reserve System, and will be a compelling feature for entry into the system of the banking institutions of the United States which are now outside of the system. The bulk of this foreign exchange business must necessarily be centered at a point in the United States where foreign bills are most in evidence, namely, New York City. The entry of the Federal Reserve System into this foreign exchange business will make these facilities available to all member banks, and thus make it possible for every member bank to take care of all their customers' requirements, as regards foreign exchange through the Federal reserve bank and its system of branches in foreign countries, thus facilitating imports, exports, issuance of traveler's checks, and help greatly to maintain the value of the American dollar in foreign exchange markets.

Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of this system and I hope this amendment carries.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That section 9 of the Federal reserve act be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 9. Any bank incorporated by special law of any State, or organized under the general laws of any State or of the United States, desiring to become a member of the Federal Reserve System, may make application to the Federal Reserve Board for the right to subscribe to the stock of the Federal reserve bank organized within the district in which the applying bank is located. Such application shall be for the same amount of stock that the applying bank would be required to subscribe to as a national bank. The Federal Reserve Board, in accordance with such rules and regulations, and subject to such conditions as it may prescribe, may permit the applying bank to become a stockholder of such Federal reserve bank.

"In acting upon such applications the Federal Reserve Board shall consider the financial condition of the applying bank, the general character of its management, and whether or not the corporate powers exercised are consistent with the purposes of this act.

"Whenever the Federal Reserve Board shall permit the applying bank to become a stockholder in the Federal reserve bank of the district its stock subscription shall be payable on call of the Federal Reserve Board, and stock issued to it shall be held subject to the provisions of this act.

"All banks admitted to membership under authority of this section shall be required to comply with the reserve and capital requirements of this act and to conform to those provisions of law imposed on national banks which prohibit such banks from lending on or purchasing their own stock, which relate to the withdrawal or impairment of their capital stock, and which relate to the payment of unearned dividends. Such banks and the officers, agents, and employees thereof shall also be subject to the provisions of and to the penalties prescribed by section 5209 of the Revised Statutes, and shall be required to make reports of condition and of the payment of dividends to the Federal reserve bank of which they become a member. Not less than three of such reports shall be made annually on call of the Federal reserve bank on dates to be fixed by the Federal Reserve Board. Failure to make such reports within 10 days after the date they are called for shall subject the offending bank to a penalty of $100 a day for each day that it fails to transmit such report; such penalty to be collected by the Federal reserve bank by suit or otherwise.

"As a condition of membership such banks shall likewise be subject to examinations made by direction of the Federal Reserve Board or of the Federal reserve bank by examiners selected or approved by the Federal Reserve Board.

"Whenever the directors of the Federal reserve bank shall approve the examinations made by the State authorities, such examinations and the reports thereof may be accepted in lieu of examinations made by examiners selected or approved by the Federal Reserve Board: Provided, however That when it deems it necessary the board may order special examinations by examiners of its own selection and shall in all cases approve the form of the report. The expenses of all examinations, other than those made by State authorities, shall be assessed against and paid by the banks examined in the same manner and at the same rate that national banks are assessed for such expenses.

"If at any time it shall appear to the Federal Reserve Board that a member bank has failed to comply with the provisions of this section or the regulations of the Federal Reserve Board made pursuant thereto, it shall be within the power of the board after hearing to require such bank to surrender its stock in the Federal reserve bank and to forfeit all rights and privileges of membership. The Federal Reserve Board may restore membership upon due proof of compliance with the conditions imposed by this section.

"Any State bank or trust company desiring to withdraw from membership in a Federal reserve bank may do so, after six months' written notice shall have been filed with the Federal Reserve Board, upon the surrender and cancellation of all of its holdings of capital stock in the Federal reserve bank: Provided, however, That no Federal reserve bank shall, except under express authority of the Federal Reserve Board, cancel within the same calendar year more than 10 per cent of its capital stock for the purpose of effecting voluntary withdrawals during that year. All such applications shall be dealt with in the order in which they are filed with the board. Whenever a member bank shall surrender its stock holdings in a Federal reserve bank, or shall be ordered to do so by the Federal Reserve Board, under authority of law, all of its rights and privileges as a member bank shall thereupon cease and determine, and after due provision has been made for any indebtedness due or to become due to the Federal reserve bank it shall be entitled to a refund of its cash paid subscription with interest at the rate of one-half of 1 per cent per month from date of last dividend, if earned, the amount refunded in no event to exceed the book value of the stock at that time, and shall likewise be entitled to repayment of deposits and of any other balance due from the Federal reserve bank.

"No applying bank shall be admitted to membership in a Federal reserve bank unless it possesses a paid-up unimpaired capital sufficient to entitle it to become a national banking association in the place where it is situated under the provisions of the national bank act.

"Banks becoming members of the Federal reserve system under authority of this section shall be subject to the provisions of this section and to those of this act which relate specifically to member banks, but shall not be subject to examination under the provisions of the first two paragraphs of section 5240 of the Revised Statutes as amended by section 21 of this act. Subject to the provisions of this act and to the regulations of the board made pursuant thereto, any bank becoming a member of the Federal Reserve System shall retain its full charter and statutory rights as a State bank or trust company, and may continue to exercise all corporate powers granted it by the State in which it was created, and shall be entitled to all privileges of member banks: Provided, however, That no Federal reserve bank shall be permitted to discount for any State bank or trust company notes, drafts, or bills of exchange of any one borrower who is liable for borrowed money to such State bank or trust company in an amount greater than 10 per cent of the capital and surplus of such State bank or trust company, but the discount of bills of exchange drawn against actually existing value shall not be considered as borrowed money within the meaning of this section. The Federal reserve bank, as a condition of the discount of notes, drafts, and bills of exchange for such State bank or trust company, shall require a certificate or guaranty to the effect that the borrower is not liable to such bank in excess of the amount provided by this section, and will not be permitted to become liable in excess of this amount while such notes, drafts, or bills of exchange are under discount with the Federal reserve bank.

"It shall be unlawful for any officer, clerk, or agent of any bank admitted to membership under authority of this section to certify any check drawn upon such bank unless the person or company drawing the check has on deposit therewith at the time such check is certified an amount of money equal to the amount specified in such check. Any check so certified by duly authorized officers shall be a good and valid obligation against such bank, but the act of any such officer, clerk, or agent in violation of this section may subject such bank to a forfeiture of its membership in the Federal Reserve System upon hearing by the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask unanimous consent to return to page 6, paragraph (a), for the purpose of offering a little amendment.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Chairman, we can not do that; we will never get through.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will ask for two minutes, then. I have not taken up any time.

Mr. PHELAN. Does the gentleman want to correct the spelling of a word? There is one word that is incorrectly spelled——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; it will only take me a minute or two, and I ask unanimous consent for two minutes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can move to strike out the last word and then proceed for five minutes and longer, if he wants to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I would like to present this amendment, on page 6, paragraph (a), and I ask permission to return——

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Chairman, I shall have to object to that, because we will never get through if we are to proceed in that way.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Chairman, I suggest the gentleman from Michigan tell us what his amendment is in his own time now.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I voted for the Federal reserve act, and I intend to support this amendment, but the criticism and what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] said this morning about the unpopularity of this system is certainly true. There is a prejudice and feeling against the Federal reserve act which ought not to be. I think some comes through the treatment that the member banks receive and in the administration of this law. Now, I have prepared a little amendment here, which would require all the regional banks to pay 2 per cent interest on daily balances for the money that they are required to send there as a reserve balance of 7 per cent. I want to say, as my opinion, that there are no State banks going into this system unless they can receive as fair and good treatment as they receive under the laws of their own States. The State banks already pay 3 to 4 per cent for this reserve money that they are asked to send up and deposit in the regional banks. It is admitted here that there will be in the neighborhood of $1,000,000,000 of this reserve money. That is the people's money, it is not the bank's money, and these banks that are required to send it there are required to pay 3 or 4 per cent on it, and by requiring these regional banks to pay 2 per cent upon this reserve of $1,000,000,000 would only be just. The member banks pay 3 per cent upon this billion dollars, and if they receive 2 per cent upon the billion dollars they will be receiving back $20,000,000. I do not think it is right for the member banks to pay 3 per cent to their depositors for this reserve and the Federal reserve banks pay nothing. Now it occurs to me that is a considerable item.

Mr. GLASS. Did not the gentleman observe that if the regional reserve banks are required to pay interest on deposits the only way they can recompense themselves is to charge a high rate of interest for rediscount, and in the end commerce and industry will have to bear the burden?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; I do not see that. Now, it was stated here in reference to the rural-credit act that the rural-credit banks could do business upon one-half of 1 per cent, and if they pay 2 per cent on the money which these banks are compelled to send to these regional banks it is simply dividing the interest with them, and they can put every dollar of that into the best security in the world—into national war certificates and into these national war bonds—and get 3½ per cent upon that very money upon which they pay no interest. So it occurs to me that if the regional banks paid $15,000,000 interest for this extra billion dollars that the member banks are compelled to send there for a reserve, instead of not paying them anything when these country banks pay $30,000,000 for this very same billion dollars, it is only fair these regional Federal reserve banks should popularize themselves and pay at least a small portion of what these country banks pay for the money they are compelled to deposit or surrender their charters. I want to say further that I voted for that in the way it was brought up in order to make more elastic currency and to give greater elasticity to our banking system; but now the reserve banks are going into the banking business themselves, and if you want to popularize them, and if you want these country banks to join the Federal Reserve System, which we do, it occurs to me it is not fair, and they are paying too much for the privilege of taking their best paper and their best securities to the regional bank and getting them rediscounted.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Chairman, I shall have to object to returning to the paragraph. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the amendment read, and I ask unanimous consent for one minute for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SMITH of Michigan: Page 6, line 18, after the word "deposits" insert: "upon which interest at the rate of 2 per cent shall be paid on daily balances."

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a preferential motion. I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. WINGO. If the gentleman will permit, can not we reach an agreement by which we will close the debate?

Mr. MANN. I do not know that there is any further debate desired.

Mr. Chairman, the Federal reserve act was passed a little over three years ago. It was claimed to be a perfect measure at the time it was passed; but, after all, the gentlemen in charge of it were very clever about making claims for it. It has already been amended up to date by four different acts of Congress. That is more than an average of one a year. In the last Congress the Committee on Banking and Currency reported further amendment to the law, comprising what is in this bill in the first eight sections. Owing to delay, pressure, or whatever it was, that bill did not pass in the last Congress, and between the ending of the Congress and the 23d of April, this year, slightly less than two months, the Federal Reserve Board desired a further amendment, which is carried in section 9 of this bill. We are a patient legislative body, but I would like to suggest to the gentlemen up in the Federal Reserve Board that they give more careful consideration to their needs, and when they want amendments to the act wait until they know what they want, and not constantly be coming in here with little piecemeal legislation.

Mr. GLASS. I concur most heartily with the suggestion. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. It is not a very good method. Before the Federal reserve banks went into operation, after the Federal reserve law had been passed, the board asked for the passage of two bills which were reported by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], which came in the House during one of the long sessions, after a large portion of the membership had been called away for their health on account of the protracted heat, and they insisted that those bills be passed.

One was brought up and was under consideration in the House. Members of the Federal Reserve Board called upon me and said it would not be possible in their opinion to put the act in operation until those two bills were passed. Well, they were not passed. We left here in August, September, or October—I do not remember which—and when we came back on December 1 or about December 1 the Federal Reserve Board said they no longer needed those two amendments to be passed at all. That was not good judgment at one time or the other, to say in August or September, "We dare not put the act in operation unless we have these amendments," and then within a month or so, before the act had been put in operation, say, "We do not need the amendments at all." They ought to give more careful consideration up there themselves. Banking and currency is a subject that, when men study it legislatively, drives most of them daffy. I think the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the chairman of the committee, has retained his head, and I think the present Committee on Banking and Currency have retained their heads, though I notice at times a little flightiness that used to be a regular thing on the part of the chairman and the members of that committee in prior Congresses. [Laughter.] But I think the Banking and Currency Committee must respond largely to the request made by the Federal Reserve Board. They are influenced by the demands of the board, and if the board is going to ask repeated amendments to the law they ought to study the subject themselves before they ask for legislation. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words. I would like to call the chairman's attention to the reading of the first two lines in section 9, page 11, where it says, "any bank incorporated by special laws of any State."

In the State of Pennsylvania we have a State bank law which does not apply to a trust company. There are two distinct laws applying there. And I wanted to make sure whether this would apply to trust companies in the State of Pennsylvania and possibly other States where they have separate laws covering trust companies and State banks.

Mr. GLASS. I will say to my colleague, if he will return to the first provision of the Federal banking law, that he will see there it provides in terms that wherever the word "bank" is used in that act the word shall be held to include the State banks, banking associations, and trust companies, except where national banks and national reserve banks are explicitly referred to.

Mr. McFADDEN. I think that covers it.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FOSTER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3673) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, as amended by the acts of August 4, 1914; August 15, 1914; March 3, 1915; and September 7, 1916, and had directed him to report the same to the House with certain amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will withhold a moment——

Mr. GLASS. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that, on line 5 of page 8, the word "event" lacks the final letter "t."

Mr. MANN. I thought that had been corrected.

Mr. GLASS. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the typographical error of the "t" being omitted in the word "event" be corrected on page 8, line 5.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the correction be made. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and was read the third time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks for a division. Those in favor of passing the bill will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Seventy gentlemen have risen in the affirmative. Those opposed will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Eight gentlemen have risen in the negative. On this vote the ayes are 70 and the noes are 8, and the bill is passed.

On motion of Mr. GLASS, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ENEMY SHIPS.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up Senate joint resolution 42, now on the Speaker's table, and substitute it for House joint resolution 62, which is an exact counterpart of the Senate resolution, and that the Senate joint resolution be immediately considered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 62, and asks that Senate joint resolution 42 be considered in lieu of House joint resolution 62. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois reserves the right to object.

Mr. MANN. It is not so very late in the afternoon, but it has been a rather strenuous week. Now this resolution comes up, and I am perfectly willing that it should be taken up. So far as I am concerned, I want a couple of hours for general debate. I think it would meet the approval of most of the Members who are here, and probably the approval of all of the Members who are absent, if we could reach an agreement to make this in order on Monday and then adjourn.

Mr. ALEXANDER. After the reading of the Journal on Monday?

Mr. MANN. After the disposal of the Unanimous Consent Calendar, which will take only a few minutes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think that is very well, in view of the fact that there are so few Members present.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MANN. I suggest that the gentleman ask first that we meet at 11 o'clock on Monday.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that on Monday——

Mr. MANN. Simply make it in order on Monday. We will reach it soon.

Mr. FOSTER. I understand the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] is working on his conference report, and will be able to present it soon if the House remains in session for a little while.

Mr. MANN. He can not take it up to-night.

Mr. FOSTER. That is true, if he is required first to print it. He can file it.

Mr. MANN. Certainly. But the gentleman from Missouri can ask that when we adjourn to-day we adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock on Monday.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I will say that the conference report on the Army bill is ready for submission, and the accompanying statement is being prepared for the signatures of the House managers.

Mr. MANN. I do not see how it could lack the signatures of the managers on the part of the House when it has been signed by the Senate managers.

Mr. DENT. I speak in regard to the accompanying statement.

Mr. MADDEN. Is that the conference report on the Army bill?

Mr. DENT. On the Army appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. Has anybody made a request?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I made a request, Mr. Speaker. If I can have opportunity I will repeat it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized.

HOUR OF MEETING ON MONDAY—11 O'CLOCK A. M.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock on Monday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday at 11 o'clock a. m. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ENEMY SHIPS.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it may be in order on Monday to take Senate joint resolution 42 from the Speaker's table and consider the same in lieu of House joint resolution 62.

Mr. MANN. You do not have to say in lieu of anything.

Mr. ALEXANDER. And that it shall be in order to——

Mr. MANN. Do not put that in——

Mr. ALEXANDER. That it shall be in order to call it up on Monday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that it shall be in order on Monday to take up and consider Senate joint resolution 42. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ARMY AND MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. MANN. Now, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] might ask unanimous consent to have the statement accompanying the conference report on the Army appropriation bill printed in the RECORD.

Mr. DENT. I ask unanimous consent that the conference report and the statement on the annual Army appropriation bill and the Military Academy bill be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. Have these conference reports been presented?

Mr. DENT. They will be presented with the statements as soon as I can get them signed.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can ask unanimous consent that they both be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. DENT. I ask unanimous consent that both the conference report and statement on the annual Army appropriation bill and on the Military Academy bill be printed in the RECORD as of to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] asks unanimous consent that the conference report on the annual Army appropriation bill, together with the statement thereon, and also the conference report on the Military Academy bill and the statement thereon be printed in the RECORD under the rule. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 42 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned, under its previous order, until Monday, May 7, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. My colleague [Mr. LANE] is absent owing to illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-eight Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Washington Post of yesterday morning quotes me as having used the following language:

There has been a great deal of legislation lately that would confer unlimited powers upon the President. A great part of this war-time legislation does this. It is indisputable that the President is gradually asking for and being given the power to run this Government about as he pleases.

Mr. President, I have not, in the Senate or on any occasion elsewhere, used the language which has been attributed to me.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 3673) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, as amended by the acts of August 4, 1914, August 15, 1914, March 3, 1915, and September 7, 1916, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair presents a concurrent resolution of the Ninth Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii, which will be incorporated in the RECORD.

The concurrent resolution is as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Honolulu, Hawaii, April 12, 1917.

The Honorable PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have the honor to forward you herewith certified copy of house concurrent resolution No. 11, which was adopted by the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii.

Very respectfully,
EDWARD WOODWARD,
Clerk House of Representatives.

Concurrent resolution 11.

Whereas both the Republican and Democratic Parties of the Territory of Hawaii are in favor of the principle that all Federal appointees within the Territory of Hawaii be actual bona fide residents of said Territory; and

Whereas the national platforms of both of said parties so provided: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Territory of Hawaii, regular session of 1917 (the Senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States is hereby requested and respectfully petitioned to enact a law under and by the terms of which all Federal appointees within the Territory of Hawaii, including judges of the Federal court, postmasters within the Territory, the collector of customs of the Territory of Hawaii, and the collector of internal revenue for the district of Hawaii, shall be bona fide residents of the Territory of Hawaii for at least one year prior to their appointment; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States, the President of the Senate of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and the Delegate to Congress from Hawaii.

THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE TERRITORY OF HAWAII,
Honolulu, Hawaii, April 2, 1917.

We hereby certify that the foregoing resolution was adopted in the House of Representatives of the Territory of Hawaii on April 2, 1917.

H. L. HOLSTEIN,
Speaker House of Representatives.
EDWARD WOODWARD,
Clerk House of Representatives.

THE SENATE OF THE TERRITORY OF HAWAII,
Honolulu, Hawaii, April 11, 1917.

We hereby certify that the foregoing resolution was adopted in the Senate of the Territory of Hawaii on April 11, 1917.

CHAS. T. CHILLINGWORTH,
President of the Senate.
O. P. SOARES,
Clerk of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a joint memorial of the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, which will be incorporated in the RECORD:

The joint memorial is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY FOR THE TERRITORY OF ALASKA,
Juneau, Alaska, April 26, 1917.

PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: By direction of the Territorial legislature, now in session, I am sending you herewith a certified copy of senate joint memorial No. 2.

Yours, very truly,
CHARLES E. DAVIDSON,
Secretary of Alaska.

Senate joint memorial No. 2.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Alaska, respectfully represent that—

Whereas conditions in the paper industry have constituted one of the most serious of our domestic problems during the past year; and

Whereas recent prices of news print at New York have ranged upward of $60 a ton, and experts of the Forest Service report that it is entirely practicable to manufacture news print in Alaska and deliver it to New York through the Panama Canal, at a cost of not more than $35 a ton; and

Whereas there are 70,000,000,000 feet of spruce and hemlock in the national forests of Alaska, besides timber on the other public lands of Alaska; in many respects its conditions as to abundant forests of paper-making woods, water power, and direct tidewater transportation, duplicate those of Norway, the leading country of the world in its paper industry; and

Whereas private capital has not been enlisted to meet the needs of a larger paper supply available at fair prices, it is desirable that the Federal Government should enter the industry as a direct method of controlling the situation: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, That we respectfully and earnestly petition the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled to enact necessary legislation for the construction and operation of a pulp and paper factory in the Territory of Alaska; and, be it further

Resolved, That a copy hereof be sent to the President of the United States, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Labor, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and Delegate to Congress from the Territory of Alaska.

Passed the Senate March 22, 1917.

O. P. HUBBARD,
President of the Senate.

Attest:

W. M. EDDY,
Secretary of the Senate.

Passed the house April 17, 1917.

LUTHER C. HESS,
Speaker of the House.

Attest:

A. H. ZIEGLER,
Chief Clerk of the House.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Territory of Alaska, ss:

I, Charles E. Davidson, secretary of Alaska, do hereby certify that the above is a full, true, and correct copy of senate joint memorial No. 2, of the Alaska Territorial Legislature, passed at the third session thereof. Witness my hand and the seal of the Territory of Alaska, affixed at Juneau, the capital, this 26th day of April, A. D. 1917.

[SEAL.] CHARLES E. DAVIDSON,
Secretary of Alaska.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a joint memorial of the Alaskan Territorial Legislature, which will be incorporated in the RECORD.

The joint memorial is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY FOR THE TERRITORY OF ALASKA,
Juneau, Alaska, April 21, 1917.

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: By direction of the Alaska Territorial Legislature, now in session, I am sending you herewith a certified copy of house joint memorial No. 6.

Yours, very truly,
CHARLES E. DAVIDSON,
Secretary of Alaska.

House joint memorial 6. (By Mr. Coombs.)

To the President and the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

We, your memorialists, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, do most respectfully and earnestly represent that—

Whereas the organic act of the Territory of Alaska provides that the canvass of the election for members of the legislature shall be governed by the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act providing for the election of a Delegate to the House of Representatives from the Territory of Alaska," approved May 7, 1906; and

Whereas the canvass conducted under the provisions of the said act is made by the Territorial canvassing board, consisting of the governor, surveyor general, and collector of customs of Alaska, in Juneau, Alaska, and can not be made until late in the month of February following the election; and

Whereas the legislature convenes on the first Monday in March, and it is necessary for the members-elect of the legislature from remote parts of Alaska to start for the capital long before the canvass can be completed and the results announced; and

Whereas the returns from such remote parts do not all reach the canvassing board until shortly before the legislative session begins, and the candidates have no means of determining the result of the election except from unofficial reports, which, in case of a close election, are not to be relied upon, which condition has made it necessary in more than one instance for rival candidates to make the long, expensive, and arduous trip from remote interior points in Alaska to the capital; and

Whereas such conditions are not unusual but very likely to happen in every election: Now, therefore,

This legislature petitions you, and each of you, to repeal that section of the act of Congress providing for the canvass of returns in the election of Delegate from Alaska to the House of Representatives approved May 7, 1906, and to provide by proper legislation for a canvassing board in each judicial division of the Territory of Alaska, to which canvassing board the returns from all precincts for members of the legislature, Delegate to the House of Representatives, and all other officers, both local and Territorial, voted for at the general election, shall be sent to be canvassed by such board, which canvass shall be final as to the members of the legislature and local officers, but preliminary only as to the Delegate to the House of Representatives and Territorial officers; and

Providing that upon the completion of said canvass by the division canvassing board the returns be forwarded to the Territorial canvassing board for a final canvass and confirmation as to the office of Delegate to the House of Representatives and other Territorial officers; and

We, your memorialists, will every pray.

Passed the house April 12, 1917.

LUTHER C. HESS,
Speaker of the House.

Attest:

A. H. ZIEGLER,
Chief Clerk of the House.

Passed the senate April 18, 1917.

O. P. HUBBARD,
President of the Senate.

Attest:

W. M. EDDY,
Secretary of the Senate.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Territory of Alaska, ss:

I, Charles E. Davidson, secretary of Alaska, do hereby certify that the above is a full, true, and correct copy of house joint memorial No. 6 of the Alaska Territorial Legislature, passed at the third session thereof.

Witness my hand and the seal of the Territory of Alaska, affixed at Juneau, the capital, this 21st day of April, A. D. 1917.

[SEAL.] CHARLES E. DAVIDSON,
Secretary of Alaska.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I have received a telegraphic protest, in which I share, from the governor of Michigan bearing upon a very important matter pending in the Senate and vitally affecting the interests of my State. I should like to have the telegram read for the information of the Senate.

There being no objection, the telegram was read, as follows:

LANSING, MICH., May 5, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH,
Washington, D. C.:

Michigan most emphatically protests against the proposed tax on automobiles which, if adopted in its present form, will threaten the very life of the State's most important industry. We are willing to give of our men, our wealth, and our vast resources, but we feel that the proposed measure discriminates against Michigan in a most unjust and unwarranted manner. A great majority of the automobile institutions are doing business on a very small margin of profit, and if the factories are taxed beyond reason the workingmen who are dependent for their livelihood upon the automobile industry will be forced out of employment. Michigan is willing to bear her share of the great burden imposed by the war, and we believe the people of our country will give us a square deal in this matter. I therefore urge you to use all honorable means against the proposed 5 per cent tax on automobiles.

ALBERT E. SLEEPER, Governor.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I also have a telegram from the Detroit Board of Commerce, and I request that it also be read for the information of Senators.

There being no objection, the telegram was read, as follows:

DETROIT, MICH., May 5, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The Detroit Board of Commerce, representing a membership of over 4,000 Michigan business men, protest against the proposed discrimination against the automobile industry through 5 per cent tax on the wholesale price, which is equivalent to 5 per cent tax on receipts. Few companies in all Michigan are strong enough to stand this. It will mean the extinction of a considerable number. All the smaller ones will be terribly hard hit. Where is the justice in taxing the automobile industry everything that general concerns are taxed and then adding the 5 per cent tax on receipts, which in the average will equal nearly 50 per cent of the profits of the more prosperous concerns? The automobile industry is anxious to bear its full share of taxation, but protests against the serious discrimination tax proposed. We ask your utmost cooperation. Thanks for what you have done.

DETROIT BOARD OF COMMERCE,
ALLAN A. TEMPLETON, President.

Mr. McKELLAR. I submit certain resolutions adopted at town meetings in Tennessee relative to the subject of food and lower prices thereof, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHY THE HIGH COST OF FLOUR?

JACKSON, TENN., April 29, 1917.

To the COMMERCIAL APPEAL:

One of the grocers was heard to say last week, "Flour has gone up $1 a barrel to-day." This astonishing statement started some thinking.

This sudden rise in price did not increase the quantity of flour, but made it more difficult to get, already out of the reach of thousands of women and children. This sudden rise in price made all the people poorer; and whom did it make richer? Only a few idle men of the nonproducing class. These money sharks are a greater menace to our public welfare than German submarines, and we are praying that they may all be captured or sunk. Those heartless speculators ought to feel the heavy hand of the law. It is more gentlemanly to gamble for the shoes of a dead child than for the bread that would have kept it alive.

The conditions of war are abnormal, and new and stringent regulations should be applied. Force should be used anywhere, the public welfare requiring it. Producers and manufacturers should have a reasonable profit; but the profits that make men suddenly rich are not reasonable; the methods that increase the comforts of the few by increasing the sufferings of the many are not democratic and humane. The future welfare of our country depends on bringing up a generation of well-fed and well-educated children; and nearly all of them will come from the homes of the poor. A patriot can not stand by and see them starved or stinted.

I am ready to be sacrificed when the good of the country demands such an offering. The Government that has the just right to force men into battle in times of war and to fix the rate of interest in times of peace has the duty to fix the prices of the necessaries of living, or to say, thus far shalt thou go and no farther.

G. M. SAVAGE.

HALLS, TENN., ROUTE NO. 1.

Hon. K. D. MCKELLAR,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We are aware that we are short on foodstuff; and don't doubt us but what we will do our bit; and we are looking to you to do something to stop this speculation which is robbing us poor people.

Yours, truly,

S. G. PRICE.

BURRVILLE, TENN., May 2, 1917.

At a mass meeting of the farmers of Burrville, Tenn., and vicinity, held on April 26, 1917, the following resolutions were passed:

"Resolved, That our Representative, Hon. CORDELL HULL, and our Senators, Hon. JOHN K. SHIELDS and Hon. KENNETH MCKELLAR, be urged to support the bill now before Congress to fix a minimum and maximum price on farm products in order to protect the public from the manipulations of the speculator.

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be furnished each of the above-named gentlemen."

Very respectfully,

A. B. PETERS.
Dr. H. V. EASLEY.
R. G. JACKS.
J. S. GREER.
C. D. HURST.

Resolutions adopted by patriotic mass meeting held at the Grand Theater, Murfreesboro, Tenn., on Friday night, April 20, 1917. About 1,000 people attended this meeting and the spirit of enthusiasm and patriotism ran very high.

Whereas the United States of America has made formal entrance into the world's greatest war, combining its destinies with those allied nations of Europe long engaged in open warfare with the Imperial German Government; and

Whereas the American people, always jealous of their inalienable rights and priceless liberties, ready always to resist any form of attack upon their institutions of government, have for almost three years, watched with unusual interest the trend of relations between their own country and its present enemy; and

Whereas the people of America loving peace and having always advocated the fellowship of all nations in a common pact of peace, especially appreciate the efforts of their President throughout all the long period of disagreement and controversy with Germany to amicably adjust differences and secure a lasting peace; and

Whereas the United States, seeking no territorial extension by conquest and having utterly no selfish ends to subserve by the waging of war with any great world power, bravely enters this conflict in behalf of the rights of mankind and the ultimate establishment of peace throughout the world in the future; and

Whereas the Congress of the United States, practically with one accord, met the view of the President in that war was inevitable, that the body of the Nation favored it, and that without delay its declaration should be made, that the honor of the Nation may be upheld; and

Whereas the Representatives in Congress from the State of Tennessee, consisting of two Senators and ten Congressmen, solidly aligned themselves with the President and voted for a declaration of war on the part of the country with the Imperial Government of Germany; and

Whereas the Nation faces the gigantic task of speedily providing all necessary preparations for the proper prosecution of the war, including greatly enlarged armed forces on land and sea, together with adequate equipment and maintenance therefor; and

Whereas the President has stressed the shortage of food reserves throughout all food-producing countries of the world, and has made patriotic appeal to the country, especially the South, to increase and conserve the food supply in order that the armies, the country generally, and the European allies of this Government may be properly supplied with such necessities: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, in mass meeting assembled, indorse the course of President Woodrow Wilson in his consistent advocacy of peace so long as there was hope for peace. We also commend his wonderful alertness, patience, conservation, and decisive course in dealing with all the causes responsible for war with the German people. We also pledge him our cooperation and loyal support and promise our best efforts toward the maximum production of food supplies during the whole progress of the war; and be it further

Resolved, That we heartily indorse the course of Tennessee's Representatives in Congress in casting their votes for the declaration of war against a known enemy of our beloved country, and express to them our thanks in view of their prompt, courageous, and patriotic action; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be furnished to the President of the United States, the honorable Secretaries of War, Navy, and Agriculture, Members of the National Congress from Tennessee, the local newspapers, and the press at Nashville.

ATHENS, TENN., April 30, 1917.

In a patriotic mass meeting held here on Sunday afternoon, April 29, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

"Whereas the United States has been drawn into the great world conflict now being waged; and

"Whereas the shortage of food supplies has been ascertained by our Government; and
